

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PACIFIC ISLANDERS' PROTECTION
BILL.—(Nos. 33-88.)

(The Earl of Carnarvon.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

THE EARL OF CARNARVON moved, after Clause 5, to insert a new Clause to empower Her Majesty to exercise jurisdiction over British subjects in islands of the Pacific Ocean not within the jurisdiction of any civilized Power; by Order in Council to create and constitute the office of High Commissioner in and over such islands, with authority to make regulations for the government of British subjects therein; to erect a Court of Justice for British subjects with civil, criminal, and Admiralty jurisdiction, corresponding with the authority of the High Commissioner; giving power to Her Majesty in Council to make ordinances for the government of British subjects being within these islands; and conferring on the High Commissioner certain powers.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, he was glad the noble Earl had explained the clause—not for the purpose of anticipating any objection that might be made to it, but that their Lordships and the public should understand its meaning. It was necessary that power should be given to control British subjects in these parts, in order to prevent their committing acts that produced great difficulties. The clause would prevent such a state of things from growing up as had been the case in the Fiji Islands.

Clause agreed to, and added to the Bill.

Further Amendments made: the Report thereof to be received on Friday next; and Bill to be printed, as amended. (No. 88.)

INTERNATIONAL COPYRIGHT BILL.

(The Earl of Derby.)

(NO. 73.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF DERBY, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, it was a very small Bill on a very large subject. It dealt with only one portion of the law affecting international copyright; it had passed without opposition through the House of Commons—it was supported by the literary interest in this country, and, indeed, he believed there was no objection to it in any quarter. The object of the Bill was to remedy a defect in the International Copyright Act of 1852. Their Lordships were familiar with the history of that Act. In 1851 a Convention on the subject of international copyright was concluded between England and France, and in the following year legislative form was given to that Convention by the passing of the Act now proposed to be amended—namely, 15 & 16 Vict., c. 12. The Convention and the Act following it reserved to foreign authors of dramatic pieces the copyright of translations of their works, with a Proviso respecting “fair imitations or adaptations,” which was embodied in Section 6 of the Act, which ran—

“Nothing in the said Act contained shall be so construed as to prevent fair imitations or adaptations to the English stage of any dramatic piece or musical composition published in any foreign country.”

It was this section which the Bill now before the House would repeal. The reason for this proposal was that it had been held by our Courts that a translation of a French dramatic piece would be a “fair imitation or adaptation,” and consequently no longer a piracy, when there had been made some trifling alteration, such as the change of a title, of the names of the dramatis personæ, or of the scene of the play. Although the passing of the present Bill would remove from the consideration of our Law Courts the question whether a translation was a “fair imitation or adaptation,” the question as to what was or was not an imitation or piracy of a foreign dramatic piece would always be left to their decision. If Parliament gave its sanction to the measure, French authors would have the same protection in English Courts as English authors had in French Courts. French authors had not that protection at present. A Bill identical with this one had been proposed by the late Government. The present Government took it up last year, and it passed through the House of Commons, but by a misunderstanding it was allowed to drop. The noble Earl concluded by moving that the Bill be now read the second time.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

INNS OF COURT BILL—

GENERAL SCHOOL OF LAW.

BILLS PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

LORD SELBORNE, in rising to call attention to the subjects of the Inns of Court and Legal Education; and to submit a Bill to make provision for the better regulation and government of the Inns of Court, and a Bill to establish a General School of Law in England, said, it would be in their Lordships' recollection that on the 10th of July last year he laid on the Table of their Lordships' House a Bill on the subject first referred to in his Notice. To that Bill some exception was taken by his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, who expressed his own views as to the proper manner of dealing with the subject.

For this expression of opinion he felt very much obliged to his noble and learned Friend, and in the Bill which he now proposed to lay on the Table would be found embodied the suggestions then made by his noble and learned Friend. The Inns of Court were ancient and very important public institutions of the country. The fact that they were public institutions in the sense that Parliament could properly deal with them as such had been disputed in some quarters; but, as he could not help thinking, on superficial and erroneous grounds. They were sometimes called voluntary Societies. No doubt, they were not originally constituted by the public law of the land, nor were they incorporated by law; but surely it was not a correct mode of expression to describe as voluntary Societies institutions into some one of which every man was compelled by law to enter, if he was to exercise one of the most important professions in this country. No man could practise at the Bar without having been called to the Bar by one of those Societies, and no man could be called to the Bar by one of those Societies unless he first became a member of the Society which was to call him. In numerous Acts of Parliament the public interest in those Societies was recognized. He would mention but one. By the first statute passed in the fifth year of the reign of Elizabeth it was enacted that the Oath of Supremacy should be taken—

“By all manner of persons that have taken or hereafter shall take any degree of Learning in or at the common laws of this realm, as well utter-barristers as benchers, readers, ancients in any House or Houses of Court.”

The Inns of Court held their property from very ancient times, and had never used it except in a manner strictly consistent with the supposition that they held it as a public trust. There had, indeed, been in some of the Inns a privilege of chambers enjoyed by the members of their Governing Body; but that practice had, he believed, ceased. The whole history of the Inns of Court showed that their property had never been dealt with as private property. He held that all the four Inns of Court were institutions of the same nature and character; and as regarded two of them—the Inner and the Middle Temple—the Royal Commission appointed in 1854, by their Report in 1855, distinctly stated that the property of the two Temples was held upon a direct trust by the acceptance of a grant made by James I., which recited that “the Inns of the Inner and Middle Temple, London, being two out of those four colleges the most famous of all Europe,” were dedicated to the study of the law, and contained this provision—

“Which said inns, messuages, &c., for ourselves, our heirs, and successors, we strictly command shall serve for the entertainment and education of the students and professors of the laws aforesaid, residing in the same Inns, for ever.”

He ought almost to apologize for having said so much on the point to which he had been referring, but he had thought it well to do so in order to meet an objection that had been raised in some quarters. In 1854 a Committee of the House of Commons, which was composed of able men, and conducted its inquiries in a most careful manner, expressly recommended that the Inns of Court should be united and made to constitute a legal University, each retaining its separate collegiate character. The Royal Commission of 1854, to which he had already referred, made a similar recommendation; and in 1863 his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack obtained from the Society of Lincoln's Inn a resolution in favour of the creation of a Legal University to which the various Inns of Court might be affiliated. On subsequent occasions resolutions, involving not less clearly the principle of public regulation in respect of these Societies, were adopted by Committees appointed by two of the other Inns of Court. Some years since, also, a Bill was introduced in the House of Commons by Sir George Bowyer, which passed through most of its stages without serious—if any—opposition from the Inns of Court, and would doubtless have been sent up to their Lordships' House but for a dissolution of Parliament, by which its progress was interrupted. That Bill, in accordance with another recommendation of the Royal Commission, proposed to give greater powers to the Inns of Court with respect to the discipline of the Bar than they now proposed, and to place the exercise of their powers under legal safeguards. He himself, while Chancellor—having for several years before interested himself in an Association for the Promotion of Legal Education, which, however, did not contemplate any interference with the internal affairs of the Inns of Court—caused to be prepared, and circulated among the benchers of the different Inns, the draft of a Bill, which would have dealt, in one measure, with the Inns of Court and with legal education. The plan, however, which he then proposed did not meet with the approval of the Governing Bodies of these learned Societies; and he received no suggestion from any of them as to any other plan which they might prefer. Under these circumstances, separating the question of the Inns of Court from that of legal education, he thought it best to make his own proposition. He did so last year, and his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack took exception to it. He had not a word to say to his noble and learned Friend's exceptions. On the contrary, he thought his noble and learned Friend had assigned valid reasons for them, and he had prepared the present Bill in strict accordance with his noble and learned Friend's suggestions. He proposed that the Inns of Court should have full liberty to take the initiative themselves in such charges as might be desirable; and Commissioners were to be appointed, by whom any ordinances which they might make were to be approved or disallowed, and who might themselves make ordinances—if none sufficient were made by the Inns of Court—subject to the approval of Her Majesty in Council, as had been provided by the Acts relating to the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Durham. The Bill did not pledge the Commissioners to draw up any plan of organization defined in the Bill itself—the question of the particular plan was left open. All he now proposed to do was to lay the Bill on the Table, and to ask their Lordships to give it a first reading. He was unwilling to throw additional duties upon his noble and learned Friend, but having discharged a duty which he considered had fairly devolved upon him, he was ready not only to defer to his noble and learned Friend's judgment, but to surrender the Bill to him if he was willing to take charge of it.

Bill to make provision for the better regulation and government of the Inns of Court presented by The Lord SELBORNE.

Lord Selborne

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was glad that his noble and learned Friend had not lost sight of this very important subject. He would examine the Bill with great attention, and should rejoice if something could be done. He rejoiced that his noble and learned Friend was willing to propose that legislation on the subject should take the course he had just indicated in his speech; and so far from wishing to take the matter out of his hands he thought it could not be in better, and was extremely anxious to give his noble and learned Friend every assistance in his power. If the Bill on examination proved to be of the character he expected to find it, he was sure the Inns of Court would come to the conclusion, not only that it was not hostile to their interests, but that it would be for their interest to promote the legal learning of their students.

Bill read 1st; and to be printed.

GENERAL SCHOOL OF LAW BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

LORD SELBORNE said, he had now to bring under the notice of their Lordships a subject quite distinct from that regarding which he had previously addressed them—namely, the subject of Legal Education. It was now many years since a very general current of opinion had set in, in condemnation of the system of Legal Education pursued in this country. The opinion of those who had considered the matter was that the position of Legal Education in England was inferior to that of Legal Education in any other civilized country of Europe. The Incorporated Law Society, which was composed of gentlemen practising as solicitors and attorneys, was entitled to the credit of having taken the first steps in the direction of improvement. So far back as 1836—with the concurrence of the Judges—they established an effective system of compulsory examination, to be undergone before admission of students to the practice of their branch of the Profession. In 1846, a Committee of the House of Commons inquired into the whole subject of Legal Education as affecting all branches of the legal profession. They made a valuable Report, which recommended the establishment of a Legal University for the purpose of a well-organized system of Legal Education, contemplating, indeed, that in that system the Inns of Court should take the leading part, but so, that some parts, at least, of the instruction afforded by them should be made available, not only for the benefit of barristers, but also for that of the members of the other branches of the Legal Profession. In 1854, a Royal Commission was appointed, and that Commission affirmed the views of the Select Committee of 1846 as to the deficiency of our system of Legal Education. One consequence of these movements was that in 1851 the Inns of Court organized, for the benefit of students for the Bar, a Council of Legal Education, which appointed Readers on different branches of the law, who were paid out of the funds of the four Societies. That plan was a narrow one, and had been attended with only small results. He did not mean to say it was not a good beginning, but he did say that it would be a very unsatisfactory end. In 1870, there was formed an association of persons desirous of establishing a larger and better system of Legal Education. They desired to have a University or General School of Law founded on comprehensive principles, in which students for whatever branch of the Profession might be instructed, and the Bill which he now desired to introduce contained provisions to that end. Three principles had been adhered to in the propositions he now made to the House, and in the Bill which he laid on the Table last year. The first of those was, that it was desirable that a General School of Law should be established in the Metropolis, by public authority, in the government of which the Crown should have some share of authority, and both the great branches of the Legal Profession should be fairly and impartially represented. The second was, that it was desirable, in the establishment of such a school, to provide for examinations, to be held by examiners, impartially chosen; and to require certificates of the passing of those examinations which might respectively be deemed proper for the several branches of the Legal Profession, as necessary qualifications—after a time to be limited—for admission to practice in those branches respectively. The third was, that the benefits of the course of study and of the examinations conducted in the Legal University should be open to all students, whether their intention was to follow the profession of the law or not, and in whatever branch of that Profession those who meant to follow it might intend to practise. Those propositions had received the concurrence and support of a very large number of persons interested in Legal Education—of many Judges, and leading and junior members of the Bar, and of the great body of solicitors throughout the country. They were communicated to the Inns of Court, and also to the Incorporated Law Society—which latter body expressed its approval of them, with the condition that in the management of the proposed institution there should not be an undue preponderance of either branch of the Profession over the other. As to the Inns of Court, Committees of great weight and learning, appointed by two of them—Gray's Inn and the Middle Temple—gave in their adhesion to the main principles of those propositions; but the Committees of the other two—Lincoln's Inn and the Inner Temple—dissented from them, expressing a wish to keep their education for the Bar entirely distinct, and in the hands of the Inns of Court: and the narrower opinion eventually came to be adopted by majorities among the Benchers of all the four Societies. On the 11th of July, 1871, he moved a Resolution in the House of Commons embodying those propositions; he was supported by a Petition numerously signed by members of the Profession and, among other eminent persons, by favourable opinions from some of the leading Members of the Royal Commission of 1854. No conclusion was arrived at on that occasion. And here he begged permission to refer to a matter which was a little personal to himself. In January last, in a periodical of some note—The Quarterly Review—there was an article on this subject, which, after stating that many persons had at first expressed their concurrence with the objects of the Association to which he had referred, without understanding them, proceeded to remark—meaning, he (Lord Selborne) supposed, that faith had not been kept with that learned, excellent, and venerable man. Now what were the facts? Three days after he spoke in the House of Commons and moved the Resolutions to which he had adverted, he received, unsolicited in any way whatever, this letter from Lord St. Leonards, dated the 14th of July, 1871—

“Even the venerable Lord St. Leonards sent a contribution to its funds of 300 guineas, which has not yet been returned to him—”

“I have been considering the proposal to establish a Legal College, in which you take so great an interest. No one is more bound than I am to support such an institution. I request you, therefore, to put down my name as a subscriber of 400 guineas—half to the foundation, and the other half to establish a prize for merit in such a manner as you and those who act with you may direct.”

He felt much gratified and encouraged by the support of so eminent a person, and one so highly qualified, after considering them as he had done, to judge of and appreciate the character of the proposals which he had made. Shortly afterwards, Lord St. Leonards appeared to think that his benefaction would not be useful unless efforts were made to collect general subscriptions for the object contemplated, and on October 2, 1871, having paid the money, which was duly invested, he wrote to inquire what was doing in that respect. It was then explained to him that it was not proposed to apply to the public for subscriptions, because in the view of many of those who supported the plan it would probably be found capable of being carried into effect without subscriptions: and if they should eventually be thought necessary, it was, at all events, considered advisable to defer any effort of that kind till the principles of the scheme should have received the sanction of the Government or of Parliament. Lord St. Leonards's reply, dated the 11th of October, 1871, was this—

So matters then remained. But on the 1st March 1872, he again moved two Resolutions in the House of Commons. The Government then spoke in terms which were very encouraging as to the future, though they were not disposed to commit themselves to a vote in favour of the Resolutions at that time, and, accordingly, it was their wish that a division should not be taken; but, after consulting with those with whom he acted, it was thought proper that a division should be taken, when 103 voted for the Resolutions, and 116, including Members of the Government, against them. He did not himself feel discouraged by that result; but the venerable Lord to whom he had referred (Lord St. Leonards) appeared to think, under those circumstances, that the foundation of the School of Law for which he had given his benefaction would have to be indefinitely postponed; and, accordingly, he wrote to say that after the division he no longer thought the scheme could be regarded as immediately practicable: he therefore suggested that it might be proper that the money should be returned to him. As soon as possible after receiving that communication—on the 4th of June, 1872—the stock in which the 400 guineas, with its accumulations, had been invested—namely, £454—was re-transferred to him; and, contemporaneously with that—on the very same day—Lord St. Leonards sent a draught for 200 guineas to be used for any purpose connected with the objects of the Legal Education Association, which he (Lord Selborne) might think proper: intimating that he then contemplated dedicating the other half of his original gift to similar purposes, in connection with the system of Legal Education conducted by the Association. Their Lordships would now see how very well informed this writer in The Quarterly Review must have been. In point of fact, the whole original benefaction was returned, and a new benefaction of half the original amount was then deliberately made for the general purposes of the Association. In 1872 his (Lord Selborne's) position became materially altered by his acceptance of the Great Seal, and he retired from the Presidency of the Association. The Government of Mr. Gladstone never had the opportunity of taking the matter up, but, of course, he (Lord Selborne) was desirous of submitting to them his scheme. He accordingly prepared a draft and circulated it—with what result he had already stated. Last year, being out of office, he introduced a Bill with such amendments as his communications with individual Benchers of the Inns of Court, and with the Council of the Incorporated Law Society, had led him to make. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack was good enough to a certain extent to express his views on that subject also; and with regard to one very main principle of that Bill — that the education to be given in the School of Law should be comprehensive and not exclusive, and should aim at opening as far as possible the education and instruction in law to everybody who might be desirous of taking advantage of it, without any reference to the question whether it was his intention to go to the Bar or to practise as an attorney or solicitor, or not become a lawyer at all, his noble and learned Friend intimated very clearly that he, at least, did not differ from that principle. On that point also he (Lord Selborne) had been repeatedly and strangely misrepresented. It had been imputed to him and to those with whom he acted that they wished to break down the lines of demarcation which now separated the barrister from the attorney and solicitor, and to introduce the American principle of indiscriminate practice. But on every occasion on which he had the opportunity of expressing himself in public on this subject, either in Parliament or at the meetings of the Association while he was their President, he had uniformly stated, not only that this was in no way an object of the Association or of his scheme, but that his opinion was strongly and decidedly in favour of maintaining the distinction between barristers and attorneys and solicitors. As to the education of the two branches of the Profession—while he considered that the same instruction should be open to all students—it was not intended to require that any students should necessarily receive any part of their instruction from the Professors or Lecturers of the General School of Law, or go through any examination except those qualifying them for a particular line of practice. All that he contended for was that an institution like this would lose half its value if it were narrow or exclusive, and that whatever instruction was given, whatever examinations were conducted by it, should be open to all, leaving men to choose for themselves what instruction they would receive and where they would receive it, and not attempting to draw a line between those who were preparing to be barristers or solicitors and those who were not intending to practise at all. That was his principle—that Legal Education, to be put on a proper basis, should not run narrowly into two grooves of mere preparation for the Bar and mere preparation for attorneys and solicitors. He apprehended that was a sound view. So thought the Committee of the House of Commons in 1846. They said that a system of Legal Education to be of general advantage must comprehend and meet the wants not only of the professional, but also of the unprofessional student; that for the further education of the solicitor it would be highly advisable he should also have, even while an articled clerk, opportunities for attendance on certain classes of lectures in the Inns of Court, and also on others of a nature more special to his own profession in the Law Society of which he might happen to be a member. Mr. Lowe, before the Commission of 1854, said this—

“I think legal education is a much larger question than the education of the Bar or even of the Bench. I think it is exceedingly desirable that every English gentleman who is independent and whose time is at his own disposal should be educated in law to a much greater extent than is now the case.”

Everyone who had given his mind to this subject had taken the same view. He might quote from the well-known work of Mr. John Austin as to the inestimable advantage it would be if a sound and legal education could be acquired, as he at that time proposed, by the establishment of a Faculty of Law in this metropolis—how it would promote improvement in the form and substance of the law, in legislation, and in juridical literature. These were advantages which could only be derived from a large and comprehensive system. With respect to the present more narrow system, although during the time this question had been in agitation, the Inns of Court had added largely to their contributions and in many respects had improved their rules, increased their teaching staff, and made considerable efforts to prove themselves worthy of the exclusive position which they claimed, he was bound to tell their Lordships that, according to the information he had received, the attendance of students in the private as well as public classes had been and was declining, and so far from the scheme succeeding in proportion to the efforts made to sustain it, the result was very different. He hoped there was no man living who upon proper occasion would stand up more firmly for the honour, advantage, and importance of the Bar of England than he would. Certainly no man was under greater obligations to them than he was. But he could not see, as respected the honour, advantage, or importance of the Bar of England, what could be gained by the depression or disparagement of the other branch of the Profession. That branch was much more numerous, and in its own way certainly not less important. It was entrusted with the dearest interests of society throughout the Kingdom; it comprised as a rule men of high honour and integrity—and he would have thought, if the great body of solicitors desired to have a system of Legal Education established to which those who might hereafter join their ranks should be admitted on equal terms—and 8,000 out of the 10,000 solicitors had petitioned the House of Commons in favour of the Resolutions which he proposed in 1872—that there was no body in England who had a greater interest in promoting in every way the honour, dignity, and importance of the other branch of the Profession than the Bar. If anything was to be done, he could not think it would be wisely done upon principles so narrow as those which now found favour with the Inns of Court. But he did not at all despair of progress in that quarter. In 1871 Committees appointed by two of the Inns of Court, as he had stated, expressed themselves in favour of the leading principles which he advocated. Down to 1869, compulsory examination was resisted by Lincoln's Inn; and yet, afterwards, when this Association was formed, Lincoln's Inn agreed to compulsory examination, which was now the rule. And now he wished to refer to a point upon which he had not the advantage of agreeing with his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack—namely, the expediency or in expediency of establishing a School of Law or an Examining Body only. His noble and learned Friend spoke strongly in favour of the latter; and, undoubtedly, if that should be the decision of Parliament, there would still be advantage in applying those principles of comprehensiveness and liberality of which he had spoken, although there might be only an Examining Body. But he never had been one of those who thought there was wisdom in the attempt to divorce in a University the function of examination from the function of teaching. Great care should, of course, be taken to prevent the Examiners from being chosen by or from those who conducted the teaching. But everyone who had ever admitted the importance of Legal Education in substance meant that there should be not merely examinations, but also the means of good instruction in the principles of law. That the institution which he proposed to establish should be a teaching body was not an essential principle of the Bill, though it was one to which he attached importance, and he hoped their Lordships would adhere to it. He now asked their Lordships to read the Bill a first time; it was in some respects altered from the Bill of last year, upon the suggestion of the Incorporated Law Society, but its leading principles were the same. The Bill proposed to incorporate a School of Law to be governed by a Senate, partly nominated by Her Majesty, partly by ex officio members filling important positions in the Law, the principal Judges, the Law Officers of the Crown, and the President and Vice President of the Incorporated Law Society; partly by members to be nominated by the Inns of Court and the Incorporated Law Society; and partly by members to be elected by barristers and solicitors. That body was to superintend the examinations and the instructions to be given in the School of Law. No one was to be required to pass a preliminary course of instruction in that or any other school. No one was to be admitted to practise at the Bar or as a solicitor who had not passed a suitable examination in the School of Law. What certificates were to be required for qualification and for practice in each branch of the Profession were to be determined with the concurrence of those who governed that particular branch, with appeal to the Judges. Power was also given, if funds should come in, to establish a teaching system. These being the leading principles of the Bill, he now begged to present it to their Lordships.

Bill to establish a General School of Law in England presented by The Lord SELBORNE.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would not now enter into any detail on this subject. He would only say that he was not obstinately wedded to his own opinion; but he had seen no reason to change the opinions which he expressed in that House last Session. He did not see how his noble and learned Friend proposed to provide funds for teaching in his School of Law—if it was to be made anything beyond an Examining Body, where were the funds to come from? His own opinion was that if Parliament attempted to establish a School of Law as a teaching body it would paralyze all the efforts at teaching made by the Inns of Court and the Incorporated Law Society—that the work would not be so well done, and that it would not be for the advantage of the public that it should be undertaken. His own opinion was that in Law as in Medicine, we should have examination only. If they provided only an Examining Body, all that would be necessary to procure funds would be to take care that everyone who presented himself for examination should pay a fee sufficient to cover the expense. But these were details which would be better discussed when their Lordships saw the specific measure which his noble and learned Friend laid on the Table.

Bill read 1^a, and to be printed.

ITALY—TARIFF TREATIES.

QUESTION.

MR. POTTER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is prepared to state to the House the information which the Government has received from the Italian Government in reference to the probable changes in the Commercial Tariff of that country?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government are aware that it is proposed by the Italian Government to modify the Tariff Treaties now in force between Italy and other European Powers. England has no Tariff Treaty with Italy, but we have a Treaty of Commerce and Navigation still in force, which contains the usual "most-favoured nation" clause. Under these circumstances, it is clear that British interests are affected by any changes that may be made in the Commercial Treaties which exist between Italy and other Powers, inasmuch as we gain by any concession which Italy may grant to them and lose by its withdrawal. The matter is felt by Her Majesty's Government to be one of importance. Sir Augustus Paget has received instructions with regard to it, and it will continue to receive the most careful attention of the Foreign Office. It would, however, be premature to lay Papers on the Table, as the matter is still under discussion.

LAW AND JUSTICE—SERJEANTS AT LAW.—QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether Her Majesty's Government have decided on discontinuing for the future the ancient degree and dignity of Serjeant by refusing to grant the coif?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, in answer to the Question of the hon. Member, I have to state that the selection of gentlemen for the degree and dignity of Serjeant at Law does not rest with the Government, but with the Lord Chancellor, who is alone responsible for the selection he may make. Under these circumstances, my hon. Friend will, I think, see that I am not in a position to give any more definite answer to his Question. I may, however, mention that by the 8th section of the Supreme Court of Judicature Act of 1873 it is enacted that no person appointed a Judge of that Court should thenceforth be required to take or to have taken the degree of Serjeant at Law.

ARMY—MEDICAL OFFICERS.
QUESTION.

MR. G. E. BROWNE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is his intention to recommend an increase in the half-pay of Medical Officers of the Army after twenty years' service, as has recently been done in the Navy; and, if so, when a Warrant on the subject is likely to be issued?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that the complaints of the medical officers of the Army were receiving full consideration, but it would be premature to express an opinion upon one part of the case. He was informed that the hon. Gentleman had not correctly represented what had been done in the Navy; but, at all events, he was not at present in a position to answer the Question.

THE SUNDAY ACT—TERRY v.
BRIGHTON AQUARIUM COMPANY.
QUESTION.

MR. GIBSON (for Mr. ASHBURY) asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been drawn to the case of Terry v. the Brighton Aquarium Company, and to ask him whether he will bring in a Bill to repeal or amend the Act 21 Geo. 3, c. 49, so as to relieve the Judges of the necessity of giving decisions which they publicly state are unreasonable.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, the attention of the Government has been called to the decision of the Judges in this case; but the Brighton Aquarium case does not seem to go to the full extent to which the judgment may possibly be applied. I have therefore thought it right that an inquiry should be made as to how far this judgment will really take effect. Until I have received an answer to the question I cannot tell the House what the intentions of the Government are in the matter.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE FROME MAGISTRATES.—QUESTION.

MR. WAIT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the committal to gaol for fourteen days, by two magistrates at Frome, on the 29th of April, of a woman sixty-six years of age, and of previous irreproachable character, for stealing coal of the value of one halfpenny, such committal being based on the uncorroborated evidence of one policeman, who did not see the accused take the coal; and, whether, assuming the case to have been correctly reported, it is his intention to revise the judgment of the justices?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it was a matter of some regret that paragraphs of this description which appeared in the newspapers were taken hold of on which to found a Question without first inquiring into the true facts of the case. He had received a very large number of letters containing the same extract cut from a newspaper. His attention having been called to the case before this Question was placed upon the Paper, he communicated with the magistrates, and also with the magistrates' clerk, and he had received from the latter a statement which put a different complexion upon the case. It appeared that the woman had been employed for some time as charwoman at the Frome schools, and that the police had received information from several quarters that it was the woman's daily habit to carry away coal and fuel under her cloak from the schools. She was accordingly watched by the police, and on the very first occasion she was watched she was seen to come away with a large piece of coal concealed under her cloak. When the policeman spoke to her she denied that she had anything, but afterwards she told him that if he would go home with her she would show him what it was, and when they got to the woman's home she produced a piece of coal, stated how she came by it, and asked for forgiveness. The magistrates, considering that these petty thefts had been going on for some time, and by a person of trust, thought it necessary to pass this sentence.

ARMY—VOLUNTEERS IN CAMP.

QUESTION.

MR. HICK asked the Secretary of State for War, If he intends to authorise the issuing of great coats to Volunteer Corps going into camp under canvas, or to increase the Capitation Grant?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, the rule is to issue five great coats per company for regimental camps, to be worn only for guard-mounting and sentry duty. At the Autumn Camps of Exercise with the Regular Forces, great coats for the full number of Volunteers are lent in accordance with regulations. There seems to be no reason for making any alteration in the present practice.

PARLIAMENT—PRIVATE TELEGRAPH WIRES—ST. STEPHEN'S CLUB.

QUESTION.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING: Sir, in asking the Question which appears in my name on the Paper, I may be allowed to state that certain rumours were afloat last night as to a particular division, and motives were attributed to certain parties whose feelings ought to be satisfied on the subject. I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is the fact, that a Division wire extends to the Saint Stephen's Club; if so, is the said club to be regarded as a portion of this House; and, if it is not, is it proper that the said wire should be continued?

MR. DISRAELI: It is not, Sir, a fact that a Division wire extends from this House to St. Stephen's Club. I have made inquiry into the matter, and I find that there is a private wire which extends to St. Stephen's Club, and which was established at the cost of that Club. But it is a privilege which is shared by other Clubs of different political opinions; and, therefore, I do not suppose that the hon. Gentleman is of opinion that it is necessary to take any further notice of the exercise of a privilege which is convenient alike to Members on both sides of the House.

ASCENSION DAY—COMMITTEES.

Ordered, That Committees shall not sit upon Thursday, being Ascension Day, until Two of the clock, and have leave to sit until Six of the clock, notwithstanding the sitting of the House.—

(Mr. Disraeli.)

PARLIAMENT—PUBLICATION OF DEBATES AND EXCLUSION OF STRANGERS.—QUESTION.

MR. PEASE asked the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition, What course he intends to adopt in reference to the Motion which stands in his name for this evening?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that in reference to the Question of his hon. Friend the Member for Durham he had to make another appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for Derby (Mr. Plimsoll.) Since yesterday he had ascertained that a very general wish prevailed that the Motion which stood in his name should be discussed as soon as possible, and he regretted to say he did not see any probability of being able to bring it on on an early day unless he had an opportunity of doing so that evening. He thought the time at the disposal of the Government was not likely to be sufficient to enable them to give him an opportunity of bringing forward his Motion at another time. The right hon. and gallant Member for Stamford (Sir John Hay) had very kindly stated that it was not his intention to bring on his Motion that evening; he understood from the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. O'Clery) that he would probably occupy but little time with his Motion; and he therefore wished once more to appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for Derby, and to ask him whether, considering the general interest felt in his (the Marquess of Hartington's) Motion, the hon. Member would be willing to withdraw his Motion that evening to enable his (the Marquess of Hartington's) Motion to come on. Under any circumstances, he would bring on his Motion that evening if he could do so before half-past 10 o'clock.

MR. PLIMSOLL said, he was very sorry to withdraw his Motion respecting the draft of water of seagoing vessels, because it touched human life, and was not a question of abstract politics; but as he had been told it would be rather prejudicial than beneficial to those whose cause he was advocating to bring on his Motion under the circumstances, he accordingly, and very regretfully, withdrew his Motion from the Paper of that evening.

THE TICHBORNE CASE—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. WHALLEY: Sir, in pursuance of an intimation which the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair permitted me to give to him, it is my intention to ask the House to allow me an opportunity of making a personal explanation. It refers to a statement made by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) yesterday week, and this is the first opportunity I have had since my return to town of calling the attention of the House to it. I do not see the right hon. Baronet in his place, although I gave him Notice two or three days ago about it and again yesterday; and as he is not present it would be more satisfactory to my own feelings if the House would allow me to state that I will call attention to the subject at half-past 4 o'clock on Thursday next and give the explanation then which I was prepared to offer now.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND)

BILL—[BILL 77.]

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, The Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 3rd May.]

Clause 5 (Continuance of certain parts of Protection of Life and Property in certain Parts of Ireland Act. 1871.)

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN moved, in page 4, at end, to add—

"Provided always, That, from and after the passing of this Act, so much of the said Act as applies to any portion of the King's County shall be and the same is hereby repealed," and called attention to the fact that whilst the King's County comprised 12 baronies six of them were included in the Schedule of the Act, some of them being the largest baronies in the county, When the Act was originally introduced. he felt that his duty to his constituents obliged him to oppose it; but whatever cause there might then have existed for this most stringent Act, he felt assured that there was not now even the shadow of a reason for continuing it for his county. The Committee would be surprised to learn that during the many years of its existence not one imprisonment had occurred in the King's County under the Act. When the measure was first introduced, he had ventured to draw an illustration from surgery relating to the propriety of its imposition. He stated that the famous surgeon, Hunter, had denominated an operation as the opprobrium medici, and had designated having recourse to such penal and stringent legislation without first exhausting existing law, the opprobrium of legislation. Baron Dowse, who then was the Law Officer of the Government conducting the Bill, replied that Hunter's observation, though generally true, did not apply to the case then under consideration, as there was no remedy for a gangrene but excision, and that that was unfortunately the condition of Westmeath and the other counties included in the Bill. Would the Government venture to state that such was the then condition of the King's County? Was there a single Member in that House who would rise in his place and make such an assertion? He was certain there was not. It had been stated that in certain other counties there were some few ill-disposed persons who dominated over the whole neighbourhood, and cowed

the well-disposed of the community. He (Sir Patrick O'Brien) could only say if that were so, it would say little for their manhood. With reference to the King's County, no such band of marauders existed in its midst, nor could the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary for Ireland point out within it any individual enjoying the bad eminence attributed to Captain Duffy. He (Sir Patrick O'Brien) unfortunately, during his political connection with the King's County, had not enjoyed a political quiet life, and for the purpose of his argument he would ask the permission of the House to very shortly summarize its social and political status during that connection. On the occasion of his first contesting the county there existed, he was sorry to say, much political animosity and sectarian antagonism; but as time wore on, all that was happily changed, and he might state that on the occasion of his contesting the county with an able and distinguished gentleman, now by the favour of Her Majesty's Government presiding over a most important portion of our Colonial Empire, nearly every Protestant in the county voted for the Catholic, Mr. Hennessy, whilst on the same occasion a large number of the Catholic constituency voted for Mr. King, a Protestant gentleman, enjoying a deserved popularity with all classes in that county. He mentioned the subject to them to show that mutual toleration and kindly feeling had a rapid growth in the people of that county, and that their present state was, that whilst preserving with firmness their political and religious opinions, all recognized in the fullest sense "the right to differ." He might tell the Committee that the King's County was of considerable length, and he would therefore pick out portions of it at each end and parts of the middle of the county, in order to illustrate the position he assumed, as to the kindly feeling existing amongst the upper, middle, and lower classes. On the coming of age, some short time ago, of the generous and popular young nobleman, whose untimely death the people of King's County had during this year to deplore, the people of Tullamore and the surrounding districts took occasion to give to the Earl of Charleville a perfect ovation. In Birr, the high character and great scientific reputation of the late

Earl of Rosse were regarded as an honour to the entire county, and a memorial recently erected testified to the veneration entertained for his memory by all classes of his fellow-countrymen. At the other end of the county, in the neighbourhood of Edenderry, the family of Downshire were justly regarded as amongst the best landlords in Ireland, and a lady (Miss Nesbitt) had shown her appreciation of the good feeling and good conduct of her poorer neighbours by subscribing the munificent sum of £10,000 to a local railway. So much as regards the relation between classes. Would the Committee allow him to refer very shortly to some of the towns in the county? Birr was a town selected by many families, unconnected with its neighbourhood by any ties of property, as their residence, testifying to their appreciation of the genial and kindly qualities of its people. Tullamore, the county town, had been rapidly progressing for years past, and was now at least amongst the best of Irish inland towns. Its Town Commissioners had petitioned that House against the Bill, and he would read a very few passages of their Petition, as they expressed the case for excluding the King's County, better than any words of his could do—

"They justly refer with pleasure to the peace, order, and morality existing throughout the county, and assert the entire freedom of the county from crime of any description."

They further asserted—

"That from the passing of the Coercion Act to the present time not a single prisoner has been in gaol under the Act."

They also said—

"That the extraordinary legislation now so long imposed is having direct, tangible, and growing evil influence on the trade and property of the county, and that the discredit cast by so high an authority as the Legislature seriously affects all trading and manufacturing operations, and determines the value of landed and all other properties."

He (Sir Patrick O'Brien) would, therefore, call on all fair men in that House not to join in casting undeserved stigma on a county which he had feebly attempted to describe. No doubt, in that debate, the awful and outrageous murder which had been perpetrated near Fermanagh might be referred to. He did not wish, whilst the trial of persons were still pending, to review all the circumstances of that frightful deed; but he might observe that this murder took place within one of the baronies included in the Schedule of the Act, and notwithstanding its operation, isolated cases—in his county he should more correctly use the singular number, and say case—might occur in the most peaceable neighbourhoods. Yet, surely, if some awful incident happened in England, in Scotland, or in Wales, they would not, from a solitary case, make the rash generalization that all the neighbourhood were impregnated with a spirit of outrage. It was not an Irishman who had written—

That could evade if unforgiven,
The patient search and vigil long,
Of him who treasures up a wrong.”

He (Sir Patrick O'Brien) could assure the Committee that he offered that Amendment to their acceptance from no desire to catch a fleeting popularity. In the year 1866, when the country was threatened with a revolution, he had had the courage of his opinions, and had voted for the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act; but on this occasion there was no case. They were continuing an Act which could be productive of no good, and could only tend to irritate and embitter classes in Ireland.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words “Provided always, That, from and after the passing of this Act, so much of the said Act as applies to any portion of the King's County shall be and the same is hereby repealed.”—(Sir Patrick O'Brien.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he hoped that the Committee would dissociate the general condition of King's County from the condition of that small part of it which was included within the provisions of the Act. As to the general condition of the county, however, he did not think it was quite such a model to the rest of Ireland as the hon. Baronet's remarks might lead the Committee to suppose; for the Chairman at the last Quarter Sessions in one of the districts of King's County had, in addressing the grand jury, described the condition of the county as not showing improvement, but signs of increasing disquiet. The special provisions of this Westmeath Act applied only to six baronies of King's County, and the hon. Baronet, on looking at the map and seeing the relation in which those baronies stood with Westmeath, would find how impossible it was to define the limit within which the Ribbon conspiracy existed merely by a county boundary. Of course, it would be in the power of the Lord Lieutenant to exclude the county from the operation of the Act if he found he could do so with propriety. Under these circumstances, he could not consent to the Amendment of the hon. Baronet.

Question put, “That those words be there added.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 80; Noes 258: Majority 178.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN then moved an Amendment the object of which was to repeal the provision of the Act which enabled the Lord Lieutenant to prohibit any prisoner from holding any communication, either by word of mouth or in writing, with any other person not in the service of Her Majesty or duly authorized by the Lord Lieutenant. The marginal note to this section, which he wished to have repealed, stated that the persons committed under the Act should be treated as untried prisoners, and he held that it was never intended that a man who had never been tried, but merely placed in custody for the purpose of preventing him from doing mischief outside the prison, should be deprived of any opportunity of meeting his family and friends, and communicating with them. The seclusion prescribed by the Act amounted almost to solitary confinement. He therefore moved his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words “Provided always, That so much of said Act as provides that ‘it shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant, if he think fit, to prohibit any prisoner committed under it from holding any communication, either by word of mouth or in writing, with any other person not being in the service or employment of Her Majesty, or duly authorised by the Lord Lieutenant as he shall direct to hold such communication,’ shall be and the same is hereby repealed.”—(Sir Patrick O'Brien.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, the object of the Act was to authorize the imprisonment of men who might be dangerous outside and to prevent them from doing mischief; and the persons so arrested were to be treated as untried prisoners. But if the present Amendment were adopted it might entirely nullify the intention of the Act, as it might be possible for the most notorious criminal arrested under the Act, by holding communication with visitors from his part of the country, to direct all the operations of the plot, and be just as mischievous from his prison as if he were outside. So far as members of a prisoner's family were concerned, under certain restrictions they were allowed to hold communication with him by the late Government; and no doubt if it were necessary for the present Government to arrest persons under the Act, subject to all the necessary precautions, they would also allow such communication.

MR. BUTT supported the Amendment. He held it to be absurd to say that if they allowed a prisoner to talk with his wife or daughter he could direct the Ribbon conspiracy from his prison and convulse the whole country. That was impossible under the existing prison regulations, and the Committee ought not to be influenced by such imaginary terrors. If the Bill passed in its present form then every old form of persecution would be set at liberty. The Westmeath men would be sent mayhap to Cork, where they would be kept apart from their families, and in many cases the family of the prisoner were not allowed to know his whereabouts. If there was any justification for these measures four years ago there was none now.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he was able to deny in his own experience the statement made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland, that prisoners were allowed to see their families; for he was himself in prison for 121 days before he was allowed to see one single member of his family, and he was imprisoned for 30 days before he was allowed to write a single letter to anyone outside of his prison with reference to his business affairs, and that although no charge had been brought against him. The prisoners were, he might add, subjected to daily insult and persecution, the gaolers in many instances boasting that they would make bankrupts of them before they were discharged from custody; and when set at liberty they were able to obtain but very little redress against these men. He would support the Amendment.

MR. P. J. SMYTH pointed out that when the Westmeath Act was originally introduced the grounds of its enactment were grossly exaggerated, and that now that county would bear comparison for peace and order with any in England or Scotland. There was no justification, therefore, he contended, for casting such a stigma upon it as the present Bill would inflict. He had visited the reported leader of the Ribbon conspiracy when he was in prison. On going to the county of Westmeath three months after, he was surprised to find this man at liberty, and on making inquiries he found that he had been liberated upon a memorial addressed to the Lord Lieutenant by the magistrates at whose instigation they were passing this Act.

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN wished to know whether all that was required to be done could not be effected by means of the prison regulations, which it appeared the Lord Lieutenant was empowered to make? If so, the words to which the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) objected might be unnecessary.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, it was believed by the late Government that it was necessary these powers should be possessed by the Lord Lieutenant, and after a careful consideration it was thought necessary to insert the words now complained of, in order to prevent an abuse of the prison regulations.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, it was not right for the present Government to shelter itself, as it so frequently did in this matter, under the wing of the late Government; and it was no argument for them to say that they did this thing and that thing because the late Government thought this or that necessary. He remembered what happened last year when the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government proposed to continue these Acts. The right hon. Gentleman took a favourable view of the case, and he promised that the Acts should be solemnly considered, and that a new Bill should be brought in altogether. Well, a new Bill had been brought in, but it was so incomprehensible that, in fact, he did not believe the Law Officers of the Crown had studied the previous Acts at all. When such questions as those of the previous night, affecting the Habeas Corpus Act, were asked the Government, they were unable to answer them satisfactorily. He did not believe that English gentlemen were prepared to keep persons in prison for two years before they were tried, or to allow that they might be locked up alone for 22 out of every 24 hours without communication with any human being, though the imprisonment might last for three or four years. He could quite understand their believing the necessity for very stringent regulations when Fenianism was in action in Ireland, and when the state of Westmeath was alarming; but Ireland was now in a totally different condition. All necessity for such stringent and severe enactments had passed away. If the Government had proposed this Bill in a spirit of conciliation, they ought to have known every point that would be raised. That they had not done so had been shown by the concessions which they had made upon some important points. The question raised by the Amendment now before the Committee was an important one, affecting as it did the liberty of the subject.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that while it was true the provisions of the Westmeath Act had been considered by the late Government, it was impossible he could recollect the reasons which led them to adopt every single provision. He thought, therefore, it was to be regretted that the Chief Secretary for Ireland should be able to give no better answer to the objections which had been raised against these provisions than that they had been deemed to be necessary by the late Government. He wished to point out that regulations issued by the Lord Lieutenant would be applicable to all the prisoners, and therefore he considered the power given by this clause to be necessary.

MR. BUTT said, that neither the right hon. Baronet nor the noble Marquess seemed to be acquainted with the facts. The Lord Lieutenant had the power of making the general regulations for prisons under the Act, which were, before being confirmed, laid before Parliament. He had made the regulations, and they had been laid before Parliament. Anything more severe could not be imagined. It was impossible to give any excuse for this abominable legislation, against which the heart of every Gentleman in that House was revolting. [A laugh.] He was sorry to hear that laugh; but he warned the House that by such inhuman legislation it was fostering the resentment of the Irish people. With respect to the remarks of the noble Marquess and the Chief Secretary, he would say that he did not make this a Party question. He hoped it would not be so treated in that House, and he would appeal to hon. Members on both sides of the House, as English Gentlemen, to treat it as a question of humanity and justice.

MR. CONOLLY, as the Member to whom the hon. and learned Gentleman had just referred, wished to say that they were dealing with illegal societies, and if they imprisoned men without taking the precaution of preventing them communicating with persons outside, they would be acting the part of fools, and not of practical men.

MR. SULLIVAN wanted to know how a prisoner could direct a confederacy from his cell, where he could see no one, and whence he could not write a letter that would not be subject to inspection. The legislation now proposed was intended to agonize the hearts of captives, and to inflict the direst cruelty, the deepest wounds that had been inflicted upon prisoners for 500 years. [A laugh.] The laughter of hon. Members was as if they jested over their mothers' graves. Were such legislation to pass in Italy, with the name, say, of Murphy Italianized into Morfini, what exclamations of horror and indignation would ring throughout England! He himself had been subjected to imprisonment for a political offence, and was kept in the prison in which he had been a member of the Board of Superintendents. The warders treated him kindly, but there was one thing that they could not allow him. He had one child, two and a half years old, and no prison regulation would allow him to see his child. He was denied a sight of his little one until the physician of the gaol, a person differing in politics and religion from himself, by the exercise of what he might term a pious fraud, obtained for him a sight of his child by passing it in as one of his own. He protested before Heaven that he would rather have suffered the loss of one of his ears than have been denied the sight of that little child; yet a peasant confined under this

Mr. Mitchell Henry

Act, and who had never been heard in his own defence, might be denied under this clause an interview with his wife or child, even in the presence of the prison warders. He denounced such legislation as an atrocity, and called upon the House, in the name of common humanity, to reject it summarily and decisively.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, he thought some argument in favour of the retention of the Proviso of the Act of 1871 ought to have come from the Solicitor General for Ireland. It was scarcely a sufficient answer to say that it had been agreed to by a previous Parliament, to which some of the present Members belonged. It was no Party question, and he wished to explain his own particular reasons for voting against the Amendment. By the section under discussion two powers were given. The first power was given to the Lord Lieutenant to make general regulations affecting prisoners. These regulations had to be submitted to Parliament, and it was desirable that they should be as lightly drawn as possible. If they were made to suit exceptional cases they would be too severe. At the same time, however, exceptional cases might require exceptional rules. There might be private signals and communications between the members of an illegal confederacy, notwithstanding the presence of a warder, and it would therefore be desirable to trust the Executive with the powers demanded.

MR. BUTT said, the Lord Lieutenant had the power to make general regulations under the statute for these special prisoners, and he could not therefore see what he wanted with these special powers.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) observed, in reference to some remarks of the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), that he had not risen before, because the reasons why the Amendments could not be accepted by the Government had been stated by his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary. The hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had, however, charged him with having neglected to answer important questions. He was in the recollection of the Committee, and stated that he had not declined to answer one single question. He was sure the Committee would excuse him for not replying to such an attack.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY explained that what he had said was "satisfactory answer."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, it was impossible for him always to answer a legal question in a manner which would fall in with the hon. Member's views. With respect to the Amendment, he had only to say that the provision of the Bill to which it referred was an exceptional one, and was meant to meet an exceptional state of things. It was absolutely necessary in special cases to provide that it should not be possible for a prisoner so to communicate with other persons as, perhaps, to counteract the whole policy of the Act. But as in other respects the persons in custody under the Act were to be dealt with as "untried prisoners," in giving this special and exceptional power to the Lord Lieutenant it was necessary to explain the manner in which it was to be exercised in this particular.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER observed, that the Government had failed to point out what danger would arise from a prisoner being able to communicate with his friends. The power which the Government wished to place in the hands of the Lord Lieutenant was, in his opinion, arbitrary in its character and quite unnecessary.

MR. MACARTNEY observed, that the whole subject now under the consideration of the Committee had been very fully and very ably discussed in the last number of the Revue des Deux Mondes—which reflected the public opinion of a great part of France and of Europe—in connection with the state of Sicily, which was just now much disturbed by brigandage, while acts of murder and rapine were rife throughout the island. That state of circumstances had induced the Italian Government to place Sicily under the operation of a special law, analogous in principle to the Bill under consideration, and in the article to which he referred that legislation was vindicated and approved.

MR. VANCE remarked that the legislation with respect to the outrages in Westmeath had been most successful. He thought the Government had acted wisely in proposing the present measure, and he trusted that the House of Commons would assent to it. He believed the powers would be temperately exercised, and would not be retained a moment longer than they were needed.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU thanked the hon. Member for Tyrone for his promised vote in favour of the Amendment. [Mr. MACARTNEY: No, no!] Well, the argument of the hon. Member was in its favour; for if the Westmeath Act was applicable to the state of things referred to as existing in Sicily, they were wholly inapplicable to Ireland, which was admitted to be in a peaceable condition. He thought the Government were now going too far in respect to the sister country.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 121; Noes 291: Majority 170.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN having given Notice of the next Amendment, page 4, at end, to add—

"Provided always, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to continue in force or operation the Preamble of the said Act,"

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Amendment of the hon. Baronet was irregular, inasmuch as it was not proposed by the present Bill to re-enact the Preamble of the Act.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN explained that he had put the Motion on the Paper from a recollection of what happened when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Horsman) was Chief Secretary for Ireland, when some portions of the previous Act having been withdrawn, the right hon. Gentleman thought it necessary that the corresponding portion of the Preamble should be omitted, and that was done with the approval of Lord Eversley and of Lord John Russell, who were both of them eminent authorities in matters of Parliamentary procedure. He bowed, however, to the decision of the Chairman.

THE CHAIRMAN repeated that a Preamble was not matter of enactment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BUTT moved, in page 4, at end, to add—

"Provided always, That nothing in the said Act contained shall authorise the imprisonment or detention of anyone, without being brought to trial, for more than one year from the date of his arrest."

The hon. and learned Gentleman briefly contended that nothing could be more arbitrary or more tyrannical than that a man should be allowed to remain in prison for upwards of 12 months with a charge hanging over him, and without being brought to trial.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That nothing in the said Act contained shall authorise the imprisonment or detention of any one without being brought to trial for more than one year from the date of his arrest."—(Mr. Butt.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 159; Noes 237: Majority 78.

MR. MUNDELLA moved the Amendment which had just been rejected, with the substitution of the words "13 months" for "12 months." He came down to the House that afternoon for the sole purpose of supporting the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt). He had expected that the Chief Secretary would explain why it was necessary to detain a man in prison for two years previous to being brought to trial—why it was necessary to vote away the liberties of three counties. Ignorant as he was of the technicalities of the law, he never dreamt that men could be arrested and kept in prison for an indefinite period before being brought to trial. It might be urged that this Act only applied to three counties; but if it referred to only three men he should expose such exceptional legislation. He moved therefore this Amendment to enable the Government to make some explanation on the subject.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That nothing in the said Act contained shall authorise the imprisonment or detention of any one without being brought to trial for more than thirteen months from the date of his arrest."—(Mr. Mundella.)

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the hon. Member who moved the Amendment that the more usual course would have been to have proposed it as an Amendment on the last Amendment.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that if he did not reply to the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, it was from no want of respect towards him, but simply because in the few words he addressed to the Committee he gave no reason why they should fix a period of 12 months, neither had the hon. Member for Sheffield given a reason why it should be 13 months. He had understood the hon. and learned Member to object to the Act in toto. When it was urged that 12 months or 13 months was a sufficient time to keep Ribbonmen in prison, if, unfortunately, it should be necessary to arrest them, he would appeal to the facts of the case. When the Act was originally passed and the Ribbon conspiracy was in a state at which he hoped it might not again arrive, kept down as it would be by the dread of that Act, it was found necessary by the late Government to arrest and imprison a certain number of the leaders of that conspiracy; and according to a Return presented this Session of those who were thus arrested it was requisite to detain in prison at least an average of four out of five for a period of more than one year. And why was that? Because it was felt that if they were released at an earlier time the effect of their detention would have been lost, and they would have returned to their localities again to carry on the conspiracy for which they had been arrested. Why, he asked, should the Committee not give the present Government the same powers as it gave twice to a former Government, and which were practically contained in the Act? For the question was not for how long a particular person should be kept in prison, but for how long those powers of imprisonment should be vested in the Irish Government? The Committee had already decided that that period should be two years. For what reason should it be less? It was said that 12 months was enough; but he had shown that in the vast majority of cases it was not enough. If those powers were vested in the Irish Government again for two years, it would be their duty to ascertain how long it was necessary by the continuance of the Orders under the Act to keep those exceptional powers in force. He could assure the Committee that the moment they obtained information that they were no longer needed in the districts affected those powers would not be continued. [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh; but they were not aware of the great pains taken by the Government in administering those Acts. The moment they could obtain information which would warrant the revocation of the Order it would be at once revoked; but suppose they should be mistaken, and the result of the revocation should be that the conspiracy was to break out in force, and they should at once re-impose the Act, they would be placed in this dilemma—they would have to deal with circumstances similar to those which prevailed when the original Act was passed, and they would be deprived of the powers they had possessed for keeping persons in prison for a period sufficient to keep down the conspiracy. From the mode in which the Government had administered these exceptional and unconstitutional powers he hoped the Committee would repose confidence in future Administrations, and would rest assured that no man would be kept in prison after his arrest for a single day longer than was warranted by the exigencies of the case.

MR. MACDONALD cordially supported the Amendment, holding as he did that Governments should be Governments of order and not of threat. A few years ago the country was startled with the information which was imparted to them, chiefly by the late Prime Minister of this country, the right hon. Member for Greenwich, that the dungeons of Naples were filled with persons who were rotting there. A cry of indignation arose from the English people, and the doors of these prisons had to be thrown open; yet they were now asked to close the doors of some of the prisons of a part of Her Majesty's dominions against men who were to be confined at the will of the Government. He set his face against such a proposal, and hoped a majority of the British House of Commons would do the same.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE said, that in this case it was the exception that proved the rule; we were obliged to pass Acts like these to justify unconstitutional acts which in Naples were committed by an irresponsible ruler. No doubt, it would be far better, if they could, to bring these men to trial; but it was a peculiar feature of this conspiracy that they could not get the evidence. He saw no reason for adopting the Amendment.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, the two cases were not so different as the hon. Member for Canterbury supposed. In Naples they saw the end of a system, but this was merely the beginning here, and tyrannies always commenced in this way. They were not sent to Parliament to trust the Government, but to protect the liberties of the subject, and the onus probandi was upon the Chief Secretary to prove the necessity for these powers. It was unconstitutional that men should languish in an Irish Bastille for two years without being brought to trial.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY held that it was an outrage on the liberty of the subject to keep men in prison longer than was necessary to prepare evidence against them. If all suspected persons were promptly tried before they were condemned, then the world could judge whether or not there existed any Ribbon conspiracy.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he was exceedingly sorry to prolong this debate; but as a very new Member he felt much difficulty with regard to the vote he should give. It might be said, as a new Member, he would be justified in following older Members; but having been in an official position, and having had some experience of measures of this kind, he felt a certain responsibility upon himself in giving his vote. It was his desire to support the Government in a matter of this kind if he could consistently do so; but this was a very grave measure, which could only be justified by very exceptional circumstances. The question had not been put before the House in an intelligible shape, and he altogether objected to the manner in which the Bill had been drawn. It did not state on the face of it what was to be enacted, but referred to a number of provisions contained in other Acts of Parliament, none of which provisions were set forth. The result was that no new Member—or, in fact, any mortal man—could understand what the Bill proposed, and he gathered from what had passed that the Government themselves hardly understood their own Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Question before the Committee was the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sheffield, and not a general discussion of the Bill.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, his observations were designed to show that as regarded this particular Amendment, and any other Amendment, the Committee had not sufficient material before them upon which to found an opinion.

MR. JACKSON said, he thought that they were much indebted to the hon. Member (Mr. Mundella) for having given the Committee an opportunity of debating this question. The Chief Secretary for Ireland contended that it was incumbent on those who proposed to limit this power to show reason for the limitation, but he maintained that obligation lay upon those who proposed such exceptional legislation to show reason for it. He had failed to understand the grounds upon which the Government thought it necessary that the power asked for should be without limit. The power of imprisonment must be either for punishment or for precaution. If as a punishment, then, surely an imprisonment of 13 months was sufficiently long for a man who had not been, and who for want of evidence could not be, put upon his trial; if, as a precaution, the power of re-arresting a prisoner who returned to his former practices was a sufficient safeguard. He thought it but reasonable and humane that such a limit should be accepted; and, indeed, it was repugnant to all men to think that a fellow-creature might be left languishing in prison from year to year without having the opportunity of being brought to trial. The hon. Member (Mr. Butler-Johnstone) contrasted this case of Ireland with that of Naples, and happily there was a wide difference—but in both cases there was the same deep-seated objection to imprisonment without being brought before his accusers, and it was for this purpose that the hon. Member for Stafford had referred to Naples.

MR. HERBERT said, he hoped the Government would give way upon this point, for such a concession would lead to the expectation that legislation of this kind would some day cease altogether. He believed that everyone on his side of the House was in favour of the Amendment.

MR. NEVILL observed, that he had listened carefully to the arguments used during the discussions upon this Bill; and he was anxious to support the Government in the performance of their difficult task. He had, however, felt himself bound, upon more than one occasion, to vote against the Government, and in favour of some limitation of the powers conferred by the Bill. Upon the present occasion, also, he felt bound to vote in favour of limiting the period of imprisonment to 13 months, though he did so with the greatest diffidence.

MR. HOPWOOD contended that it lay upon the Government to show why they should vote for a longer period of imprisonment than that mentioned in the Amendment. They were asked to give these extraordinary powers at the same time that they were told that there was not a single Ribbonman in prison under them. It was their duty to watch carefully over the liberties of the subject; and not lightly to vote that a man might be kept for a long period in prison without power of appeal of any sort.

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL said, the reason why he should vote in favour of the powers contained in the Bill was because he thought he was voting on the side of mercy. He asked why it was there was not a single Ribbonman now in prison? He asserted that it was because of the powers contained and proposed to be continued in this Bill. It was because the severity of the punishment had acted as a deterrent, and it was the duty and interest of the Government to have punishments framed which were sufficiently severe to prevent misguided individuals from subjecting themselves to the penalties of the law.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 171; Noes 250: Majority 79.

MR. ENNIS moved, in page 4, at end to add—

"Provided always, That from and after the passing of this Act so much of the said Act as applies to the county of Meath shall be and is hereby repealed."

He thought there was no reason why the county of Meath should come under the provisions of the Act, because for sometime there had been no crime and outrage there. At Assizes after Assizes the Judges congratulated the Grand Jury upon the state of the county.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That from and after the passing of this Act so much of the said Act as applies to the county Meath shall be and is hereby repealed."—(Mr. Ennis)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH observed that the Government could not accept the Amendment for the reasons he had already given in reference to the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for King's County (Sir Patrick O'Brien).

MR. PARNELL supported the Amendment. He said, the Act was passed in 1871 with the object of meeting a Ribbon conspiracy which was supposed at that time to exist. The Chief Secretary had not shown that any such conspiracy now existed, and as no reasonable grounds had been shown, there was no reason why the Act should be continued.

MR. FAY vindicated the character of the county of Meath from the charge of lawlessness so frequently made against it by alarmists, whose fears, when examined, were found to be groundless. Perhaps, however, it was useless to expect much from a Government which had refused to allow a poor prisoner to see his wife and children.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 71; Noes 290: Majority 219.

And it being after ten minutes before Seven of the Clock, the Chairman left the Chair, to report Progress.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

And it being now Seven of the clock the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

SPAIN—THE CIVIL WAR—RECOGNITION OF BELLIGERENT RIGHTS.

RESOLUTION.

MR. O'CLERY moved—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that, having regard to the extent and prolongation of the Civil War in Spain and the interests connected with this country therein involved, the belligerent rights of that portion of the Spanish population who maintain in their provinces the claims of Don Carlos to the throne of Spain be recognized by Her Majesty's Government."

The hon. Gentleman observed, that the recognition of the belligerent rights of the Carlists was worthy of the consideration of the House, and in urging such a step on the Government he would briefly review the history of the struggle in Spain. Three years ago, while the Duke of Aosta reigned at Madrid, the Carlists raised in the North of Spain the flag of their legal and recognized King, Don Carlos. The movement was commenced by a handful of volunteers in the mountains of Catalonia and Biscay; but now the Carlist Army numbered 75,000 well-trained, well-disciplined, and well-armed men, having at their command from 180 to 190 pieces of artillery. This was a significant fact which could not be ignored in the consideration of this subject. Again, Don Carlos had not an army only, but likewise a thoroughly organized Government in the North of Spain which directed and utilized the resources of that part of the country. Thus a new Power had sprung up in Europe, small indeed as regarded territory, but powerful enough to resist the attacks of its enemies. The relations between the Powers of Europe and this new country were of such an uncertain and doubtful character that they had threatened to disturb the general peace of the Continent. England, as a maritime Power, had much to do with the new kingdom, because it consisted not only of large inland portions of Spain, but it was master of a considerable coast line and several seaports. The Government at Madrid was virtually powerless to prevent our commerce from suffering serious injury. Several vessels while endeavouring to enter Bilbao had been fired at, because they would not recognize the Carlist authority, and he might mention particularly the cases of the Caroline, an English steamer, and the Gustav, a German vessel. The question before the House involved, therefore, matters of great interest to British merchants. It might naturally be asked what had the Carlist movement done, and what had it achieved to establish a right to be recognized? He would answer that the movement had, notwithstanding all the agencies brought to work against it, existed for three years, and not only had it existed, but it had increased materially in strength. On the other hand, what could they say of the Madrid Governments which had attempted in vain to put down this movement? In comparing the Carlist Government and the Madrid Governments, it would be found that while the same men had remained at the direction of the Carlist movement throughout the three years of its existence, the Government at Madrid had constantly been changed. There were many reasons why the Government of Don Carlos should be recognized, and one was that the various Governments at Madrid had virtually recognized it.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. O'CLERY resumed: The Government of Castelar had virtually recognized the Carlists as belligerents by exchanging prisoners with them, and the Carlists were regarded by the Spanish Government, not as insurgents, but as a Power actually at war with it. Even at a very recent date prisoners had been exchanged between the contending parties under a treaty. The Carlists had an army as strong as we had in the United Kingdom. Their bravery had won the administration even of their enemies. Vattel laid down the dictum that when an insurrectionary Power had assumed such dimensions as to utterly debar the Government of the country from acting within certain limits, it was the duty of foreign Powers to recognize the so-called insurgent Power as far as the protection of life and property in that country was concerned. England had over and over again acted upon that principle, and, taking into consideration the facts that the Government at Madrid had failed to give peace to Spain, that the Carlist King, Don Carlos, had an Army of 75,000 strong, and that the Basque Provinces were virtually a new kingdom, ruled by a regularly organized Government, it became necessary that other Powers having commercial interests in Spain should recognize the Carlists. In conclusion, the hon. Member said, he thought he had shown good grounds for presenting his case to the consideration of the House, and therefore he begged to move his Resolution.

MAJOR O'GORMAN seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that, having regard to the extent and prolongation of the Civil War in Spain and the interests connected with this Country therein involved, the belligerent rights of that portion of the Spanish population who maintain in their provinces the claims of Don Carlos to the throne of Spain be recognised by Her Majesty's Government."—(Mr. O'Clery.)

MR. BOURKE said, interesting as the subject was, he did not intend to trespass upon the attention of the House for more than a few moments, because he knew they were anxious to consider the other matters that were on the Notice Paper. The question of the period at which belligerent States should be recognized by neutral and friendly States was doubtless one of a very interesting character; but, at the same time, it was a question concerning which it was almost impossible to lay down any general principles. What Mr. Canning said in 1825 had always been recognized as authoritative respecting the belligerency of certain States, and remained true at the present time—namely, that it was a question of fact rather than of principle, and depended entirely upon certain circumstances of each individual case. The first and main question to be considered in cases of this kind was, whether it was necessary that we should recognize a portion of the population of another country as belligerents? He listened with great attention and expectation to the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, because he perceived in the Resolution the words "in the interests of this country," and he (Mr. Bourke) thought it was very probable that the hon. Member would have endeavoured to show that, so far as the interests of this country were concerned, it was desirable that the belligerency of the Carlists should be recognized; but he had failed to hear from the hon. Gentleman anything to support such a proposition, which, after all, was the proposition which the hon. Member had to maintain. In every case it was necessary to consider the history of the insurgents, their resources, their organization, the population as compared with the parent State, and, above all, their capabilities and the probabilities of their being able to hold their own as an independent State, if left to themselves. In the case of land warfare it was almost impossible to say—where a State was not contiguous, that there was any necessity whatever in the interests of the recognizing State to recognize the insurgent State before it had completely established its independence; because it was impossible to point out any one interest which, if the State was not contiguous, could be affected by a state of war, provided that that war was only carried on by land. In maritime warfare it was, of course, different, because if the cruiser of an insurgent State could manage to go about destroying the commerce either of the parent State, or of a neutral State, it became an important matter for all the persons interested in commerce to endeavour to find out the status of the insurgent State. They must be either pirates or belligerents; and, of course, everyone knew that unless they were treated as belligerents, they could have none of those rights upon the sea which were generally accorded to belligerents, and must be treated to all intents and purposes as pirates. In the case of a maritime war all kinds of questions arose, directly the war broke out, as to the right of capture, the right of seizing goods on board neutral vessels, and as to those maritime rights which were accorded to belligerents, and which, of course, pirates could not possess. In the American War, England recognized the Confederate States at a very early period of the struggle, the reason for the recognition by this country and by other countries mainly being that the Confederates had cruisers on the seas, and that it was absolutely necessary for our own safety as well as that of other countries to recognize them as belligerents. Those were some of the considerations which must be applied in cases where it was proposed to recognize belligerent and insurgent States. How could they be applied to the present question? In the first place, the Carlists had no ships, and therefore the general inducements which acted upon this country to recognize the Confederate States could not apply to the Carlists, who must be looked upon as persons carrying on an insurgent war by land. He had failed to discover in the speech of the hon. Gentleman any reasons showing the necessity to recognize the Carlists as belligerents. In fact, it was impossible to point out any single interest in this country which would be affected beneficially by the recognition of the Carlists, and that, after all, was the point they had to consider. When the Carlist position was considered, they must also consider the past history of Spain, and the events which had taken place with regard to the distinguished warriors in question. In the Seven Years' War, between 1836 and 1841, the position of the Carlists was very much the same as it was now, and their position was certainly no better now than it was then. During the whole of that time they were never recognized as a belligerent Power. It was perfectly true that at the present time they occupied a very large portion of the north-east of Spain; but, at the same time, it was equally true that the Government of Madrid occupied almost all the large towns in that portion of the country in which the Carlists were strongest—Pamplona, Vittoria, Lograno, San Sebastian, Irun, Fuenterrabia, Bilbao, and one or two other large towns. It was doubtless perfectly true that the Carlist forces were exceedingly strong in the mountain districts, and he believed that the hon. Member had not overstated the strength of those forces. No doubt, also, the Carlists had a large artillery force; but it must be recollected that their great strength arose from the nature of the country, which was extremely favourable to the Carlist mode of warfare, and that they never attempted to occupy any large portion of Spain beyond the district to which for many years they had been historically attached. He did not intend to enter into the question of the age of the present Government of Spain; he did not think the question was as to a comparison between the age of the Government of Spain and the age of that of Don Carlos, because the fact was that the whole of Spain, with the exception of the part to which he had alluded, recognized willingly and cheerfully the Madrid Government. Beyond that they had nothing to do. It was not their affair which was the best Government or which was the worst; all they knew was that, with the exception of part of Biscay and Navarre and a portion of Catalonia which was held by the Carlist forces, the rest of the country willingly accorded its allegiance to the present Government at Madrid. Under those circumstances, he did not think the House could hesitate for a moment in refusing to assent to the Resolution of the hon. Gentleman. He trusted that the hon. Gentleman would be satisfied with this discussion, and would not proceed to divide the House upon his Motion. He did not wish to say one word against the Carlists, a brave race and having amongst them some of the hardest warriors in the world; but acting upon the principles which this country had always followed with regard to the recognition of belligerents, Her Majesty's Government did not see that they could accord belligerent rights to the Carlists.

MR. MELDON said, as his hon. Friend had failed in showing any benefits which would ensue from the recognition of the Carlists, he ought not to press his Motion to a division.

MR. O'CLERY, in reply, remarked that, in his opinion, the policy enunciated by the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was rather a dangerous one to follow; and urged that the recognition of the Carlists by England would be an act worthy of this country and of the position which England occupied as a civilized Power. With regard to the direct interests of this country he had already stated that our commercial interests were largely bound up with those of the North of Spain. As he conceived that the virtual recognition recorded to the Carlists, on the part of the hon. Gentleman opposite, would strengthen the resources of the Carlist Army, he would withdraw his Motion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLICATION OF DEBATES AND EXCLUSION OF STRANGERS.—RESOLUTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The subject, or rather the two subjects, to which I propose to call the attention of the House this evening has been brought on more than one occasion before its notice within a recent date; but the House has not considered it necessary to take any action in relation to the matter, probably for the reason that no great or serious practical inconvenience was found to have resulted from the existing state of things, and from the circumstance that this House is always unwilling to alter any of its Rules or Orders merely to meet a theoretical grievance as opposed to a practical grievance. During the present Session, however, incidents have occurred which have caused the House to be of opinion that both the subjects to which I propose to call attention are in a position which requires the further consideration of the House. The Resolutions which I have placed upon the Paper deal, as the House will observe, with two points. The first Resolution deals with the question of the publication of the reports of our debates, and the last two Resolutions deal with the question of the exclusion of Strangers. As to the publication of our debates, the House has always entertained—or appears to have entertained—very considerable jealousy on the subject of the publication of any reports of its debates. The reason for that seems to have been that in the time of Charles I. and his Successors, very unpleasant consequences frequently ensued in consequence of words which were spoken by Members of this House. I do not think I could give a better account of the reasons which appear to have prompted this jealousy on the part of the House with regard to the publication of its debates than by reading a short extract from a speech which was made by Lord Campbell—a much greater authority than I can pretend to be—on the occasion of the introduction of a Bill which dealt, among other things, with the present subject. Lord Campbell, on the second reading of the Bill, said—

“The reason why the Orders prohibiting the publication of the debates had been passed by both Houses was this:—During the progress of the struggle between the Crown and the two Houses of Parliament every effort was made by the two Houses to prevent the Crown from exercising the illegal power which it had usurped of punishing Members for what they spoke in Parliament, and it was then that these Orders were made. Secrecy was then of great importance, because when the Crown heard that proceedings which it disapproved were going on in the House of Commons next morning, the Black Rod would knock at the door and summon the Commons to the Upper House, and Parliament was dissolved. Sometimes matters went further than this. Members were summoned before the Privy Council and examined as to their speeches, and if they could not give a satisfactory explanation they were sent to the Tower, there to pass their time until the prorogation. It was to prevent the Crown from getting notice of what was going on in Parliament that these Orders were made, and they were chiefly directed against the publication by Members of their own speeches. On the 13th of July, 1640—not to go further back—the Commons ordered that ‘No Member shall either give a copy or publish in print anything that he shall speak here, without leave of the House;’ and on the 22nd of March of the same year—‘That all Members of the House are enjoined to deliver out no copy or notes of anything that is brought into the House, propounded or agitated in the House.’ On the 28th of March, 1642, the Commons resolved that ‘What person soever shall print or sell any Act or passages of this House under the name of a diurnal or otherwise, without the particular licence of this House, shall be reputed a high contemner and breaker of the privilege of Parliament, and punished accordingly.”—[3 Hansard, cxlix. 953.]

Lord Campbell further stated—

“Until the year 1771 both Houses set their faces stedfastly against any publication of any part of their proceedings: but the Rule was violated by reports under fictitious names. There were reports, for instance, of the proceedings of the Parliaments of Lilliput and Utopia, in which the speeches of Bolingbroke and other great speakers of the reigns of Anne and the first two Georges were given under fictitious names. But there was great apprehension that the publisher of these might at any time be sent to prison. Since 1771, however, the Rules against the publication of reports had been relaxed, in consequence of a memorable crisis that then occurred, and of which an excellent account was given in Lord Mahon’s history, when the House of Commons tried to enforce their order to prevent the publication of debates, and sent a messenger to arrest the publisher. But the messenger himself was arrested and sent to Giltspur Street Compter; and although the House of Commons sent the Lord Mayor and an Alderman to the Tower for contempt, the House was finally baffled, and from that time any person who pleased had published the debates in Parliament without fear.”—[Ibid., 955.]

I might enlarge on this subject. I might remind the House that the debates as to what took place during that protracted conflict of which Lord Campbell reports merely the conclusion are now only known to us through the agency of an hon. Member who happens to have been a relative of my own. Since the House entered into that memorable conflict with the printer of a newspaper and with Mr. Wilkes, these Orders that still remain have practically fallen into disuse. We have retained on our Journals Resolutions which declare it to be a breach of the Privileges of the House for any person to report our debates; yet we have in the construction of the House in which we now sit provided accommodation especially for the use of reporters, and the House unanimously considers at this day that the publication of our debates in the public journals is of great advantage not only to the public but also to themselves. It is a convenience to ourselves to be able at all times to refer to the admirable reports of our proceedings which are given in some of the papers; and I am sure we all agree in thinking that it is of the greatest possible public importance to have the proceedings of this House faithfully reported to the public out-of-doors, that the constituencies may know what their Representatives are doing; and I believe we all concur in the opinion that the best political education which the people of this country can have is to read accurate reports of the debates conducted within these walls. Well, if the House has retained those Orders on its Books, I conceive that it has done so with the object of retaining the power, if it should think necessary to use it, of punishing the publisher of any newspaper that should maliciously misrepresent the debates in Parliament, or commit any other offence with reference to the publication of Parliamentary proceedings. Since the conclusion of the contest to which I have referred, it has happened on more than one occasion that printers and publishers of newspapers have been summoned, or that a Motion has been made that they should be summoned, to the Bar of the House, nominally on account of Breach of Privilege committed by publishing debates, but really on account of wilful and malicious misrepresentation of what has passed here. Well, if this is the present position of affairs, it may be asked what practical object there is in proposing any alteration. Reporters are admitted within our walls, and the House is glad that its debates should be published, and only retains this power for exercise in the case of misrepresentation. Well, the practical object appears to me to be this. In the first place, the House, by its present Rules, may be placed at any time in a false position. It is in the power of any Member to call attention to the publication of our debates; and, as happened a very short time ago, the House being, perhaps, somewhat taken by surprise, may have no alternative but to affirm the principle that the publication of the debates, which the House at all times considers to be a useful and salutary proceeding, is a breach of its Privileges. There is another practical object that can be attained. In case of it being necessary to take proceedings against the publisher of a newspaper for wilful misrepresentation, it seems to me to be of the highest importance that in a case where a conflict may occur between this House and the Press or as has occurred before now with Courts of Law—that this House should occupy a perfectly clear and logical position, and should not be placed in the condition of assuming to prosecute the printer or the publisher for a Breach of Privilege, when what the House really complains of is not the publication but a misrepresentation of its proceedings. A further question may then be asked why, if any alteration is to be made, I do not repeal the Orders referred to in Lord Campbell's speech, and change our definition of the word Privilege? Well, my answer to that is this. I am perfectly well aware the House would regard with very great jealousy any proposal to modify in any respect the Privileges which have been maintained by its predecessors, and which it still maintains itself; and, further, that this being a question which we desire to keep in our own hands, and to deal with as a matter of Privilege, and not as a matter of law, it is impossible for the House to create new Privileges. It will be far easier for us to deal with questions which may possibly arise, and which we cannot altogether foresee, upon the Privileges obtained for us by our predecessors, and which we still assert, than to abandon them and attempt to create new Privileges. The Resolution, therefore, which I have to propose does not, in the least, trench on the Privilege which the House has asserted for such a length of time, and which we still maintain. It is rather a rule for the guidance of the House than an alteration of the law as affecting the relations between Parliament and the Press. The Resolution which I have to propose amply preserves the power of the House to deal with any misrepresentation, or other offence against the Privileges of the House. When I placed the Notice on the Paper, I had some doubt that the terms of the Resolution were almost wider than the occasion requires. The Resolution is to the effect—

“That this House will not entertain any complaint, in respect of the publication of the Debates or Proceedings of the House, or of any Committee thereof, except when any such Debates or Proceedings shall have been conducted with closed doors, or when such publication shall have been expressly prohibited by the House, or by any Committee, or in case of wilful misrepresentation, or other offence in relation to such publication.”

Well, these words are certainly wide; but I must say I have seen with some satisfaction that they have generally been accepted by the Press as affording a reasonable and satisfactory solution of the difficulties which have occurred, or which might occur; and I do not think, on consideration, the House will be of opinion that they are wider than the occasion requires. It is impossible to foresee all the cases that may arise; but if the form which the reports of our proceedings have assumed be persevered in it is quite possible the House might wish to interpose some check on the mode of reporting adopted by some of the public papers. Unfortunately, as I think, several newspapers of the day have recently greatly restricted their formal reports of the debates in Parliament, but indulged to a very considerable extent in a somewhat sensational description of the proceedings of the House. I have never, however, seen any account of those proceedings to which I could for a moment suppose the House would desire to take exception; but still it is possible that this system might be developed to such an extent as might tend to bring the House into contempt, when it would be necessary for the House to take notice of them; and, therefore, I think that the words I have proposed, if the House is willing to restrict the Privilege by Resolution, are not too wide to meet the occasion. I have said my Resolution is rather a rule to guide our own proceedings than to establish a different law in relation to the papers. The benefit I think the House would derive from such a rule would be that it would be saved being placed in a false position, such as I think it occupied the other day on the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis), when it passed a Resolution that the printers of two newspapers had committed a breach of Privilege in reporting the proceedings of a Committee, the proceedings of that Committee having been held with open doors, and it being perfectly well known to the Members of the Committee and the House, that the proceedings were being reported by the Press. The House, it appears to me, has shown somewhat greater jealousy about the publication of the proceedings of Committees since 1771 than in regard to the publication of its own proceedings. Within recent years the House passed a Resolution that the publication of the proceedings or the Report of a Committee before it was presented to the House was a breach of Privilege; and it is perfectly conceivable that such a proceeding might be, on the ground of public convenience, extremely objectionable, and I think that the Resolution I propose will meet this case also. It cannot be expected that the proceedings of Committees will be kept out of the newspapers, unless the Committees determine to sit with closed doors, or unless it is determined in particular cases that particular answers given by the witnesses shall not be reported. This case is entirely met by the Resolution I propose, and I think Committees and the House will retain all the authority over the publication of their proceedings which may seem necessary. The second point to which my Resolutions refer is the exclusion of Strangers. Up to a very recent date the Orders of the House have been as peremptory in relation to the exclusion of Strangers as they have been in relation to the publication of its debates. In the speech of Lord Campbell, to which I have referred, he gives an account of our proceedings in that respect. He says—

“Until 1845 there were positive orders of the House of Commons against the admission of strangers:—‘Ordered, that the Serjeant-at-Arms attending this House do from time to time take into his custody any stranger whom he may see, or who may be reported to him to be, in any part of the House or galleries.’ It was forbidden to any stranger to come into any part of the House or gallery belonging to the House. It was also ordered ‘that no Member of this House do presume to bring any stranger into any part of the House or galleries.’”—[3 Hansard, cxlix. 955-6.]

In 1844 a Motion was made by Mr. Christie for a Committee to inquire into the matters to which I have now called the attention of the House. That Motion was negatived; but the discussion which took place was not without some result, because in the next year both Orders to which I have referred were modified by the House, and they now stand in this shape—

“That the Serjeant-at-Arms attending this House do from time to time take into his custody any stranger whom he may see, or who may be reported to him to be in any part of the House or gallery appropriated to the Members of this House.

“That no Member of this House do presume to bring any stranger into any part of the House or gallery appropriated to the Members of this House while the House or a Committee of the Whole House is sitting.”—[Ibid. 956.]

By that Order, and by the accommodation which has been provided for reporters, we practically recognize the presence of Strangers during our debates; but though practically recognizing the presence of Strangers during our debates, we have, as the House is aware, retained without alteration the former usage—for I believe it is a usage, and not a Rule of the House—under which the Speaker is obliged to order that Strangers shall be excluded as soon as any single Member takes notice of their presence. This is a power which has been used and inconveniently exercised on several occasions in recent times. In the year 1849 Mr. John O'Connell more than once made use of the power of excluding Strangers—on account, I believe, of the opinion which he entertained that his speeches were inadequately reported. That led to the appointment of a Committee. That Committee does not appear to have taken evidence; at all events, no report of evidence is preserved; but it came to the conclusion that there was no adequate necessity for the alteration of the Rule, and nothing was done in consequence. I presume they came to that conclusion believing that no other Member of the House was likely to exercise the Privilege of the House in the inconvenient manner in which Mr. John O'Connell had done. I am not aware that the power was exercised again for a considerable number of years; but in 1870 it was used for a different purpose by the hon. and learned Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd). A debate of a particular character came on in the House, and the hon. and learned Member for Ayr—not capriciously, but for an object—proposed that Strangers should be excluded from the Gallery. That proposition, owing to the peculiar nature of the regulations of the House, could not be debated, and what may have been the opinion of the majority of the House I do not know; but having taken notice of the presence of Strangers, it was in the power of the hon. and learned Member for Ayr to exclude, and he did exclude, Strangers from that particular debate. The subject was then brought to the notice of the House by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley.) He particularly objected to the occasion on which the power was used, and called on the Government of the day to appoint a Committee, or take other steps, by means of which the question might be placed on a more satisfactory footing. My right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), then at the head of the Government, stated that, if it were the wish of the House that a Committee should be appointed, he had no objection to the appointment of such a Committee; but he did not seem then to consider that it would be necessary that any steps should be taken. A Committee was subsequently appointed to consider several questions affecting the business of the House, of which my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) was Chairman. That Committee passed a Resolution—I believe only by a narrow majority—to the effect that the existing rule ought to be altered, and that Strangers should not be excluded, except on the Question put and agreed to without Amendment or debate. My right hon. Friend, as Chairman of that Committee, moved a Resolution to that effect in this House. Two objections appear to have been taken to that proposal. In the first place, it was necessary in cases of disorder or disturbance of any kind, the House should retain its power of summarily excluding Strangers. It was argued that every other Assembly except our own had, at some time or other, more or less been disturbed in its proceedings by strangers in the galleries, and that, as it was impossible to know what might occur in our own House, it was essential that some summary mode of removing strangers should be retained in case of necessity. The second objection was that the power of exclusion, as proposed by the Committee, might be used for the purpose of delaying a debate. I admit there is considerable weight in both objections, and I venture to think the proposals I have placed on the Table have some advantages over those moved by my right hon. Friend. In the first place, I think that the power of excluding strangers in cases of disturbance and disorder may very advantageously be left in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman who does now, and we must assume in all cases will, possess the complete and entire confidence of the House—that it might be left in the hands of the Speaker to give directions to the Serjeant-at-Arms, in case of disturbance of any kind whatever, to take what measures may appear to him necessary to preserve the order, tranquillity, and quiet of our proceedings. The only objection I can conceive to my Resolution is that already the right hon. Gentleman has the power to take what measures may be necessary for that purpose. But, the power of excluding Strangers being in the hands of any single Member, there could be only very rare occasions for the exercise of that power by the Speaker. I therefore do not think it superfluous when the circumstances are somewhat altered, that the right hon. Gentleman should have the power to direct the officers of this House to take such steps as may be necessary for the preservation of order. As for the objection that the employment of this power may be used for purposes of delay, I cannot think there is much in it. Our Forms already give ample opportunity of delay if a Member or a minority of Members are disposed to take advantage of them for that purpose, and we therefore rely more on the good sense and good feeling of hon. Members than upon positive enactment to prevent our proceedings from being unnecessarily delayed. Nevertheless, if the House should be of opinion that the Resolutions which I propose might be abused, I should be perfectly willing to defer to the opinion of the House; and if it thinks fit to adopt the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope), that this power should be used only once in the course of a Sitting, I shall not be disposed very seriously to object. It seems to me, however, that to restrict the use of this power to one occasion during a Sitting of this House might possibly lead to inconvenience. I would suggest to the hon. Member it might be better to propose that the Motion to exclude Strangers should not be made more than once during the progress of the same debate. [Mr. BERESFORD HOPE intimated that that was his proposal.] If the hon. Member should think that proposition an improvement, I would make no objection. There is another point in which I have somewhat departed from the recommendation of the Committee. The Committee recommended that in all cases when it was proposed that Strangers should be excluded the question should be decided without Amendment or debate. That does not seem to me altogether a proper Resolution. If the necessity for the exclusion of Strangers can be seen beforehand it appears unreasonable that the Member who proposes it should not have an opportunity of stating his reasons, and that the House should not have an opportunity of debating it. I need refer only to the occasion to which I have before alluded, when the late Member for Ayr (Mr. Craufurd) proposed to exclude Strangers. It seems to me that the House would consider it perfectly reasonable that any Member who thought it for the public interest or for the interest of morality and decency that Strangers should be excluded should have an opportunity of stating his reasons, and that there should be debate upon it. But if, on the contrary, the question arises suddenly, then I should think it would be unreasonable that the Business before the House should be delayed by discussions. I have now, before I sit down, only to refer to the Amendments of these Resolutions which have been put on the Paper. As to the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), I can see no reason why the House should delay its decision upon the two questions referred to until another Committee has been appointed. As I have already shown, this question has been already considered by two Committees, and the results arrived at from their deliberations have not been so encouraging, I think, as to induce the House to consent to the appointment of another Committee. I understand the object of my hon. Friend to be that a Committee should consider the question of what are known as official reports. That, no doubt, is a question which may very well receive the attention of the House; but it is not directly or immediately connected with the subject I have brought before it. There are certain inconveniences to be removed, with which the Resolutions I have placed on the Paper deal, and I do not see that it is in the least necessary to mix these questions with the consideration of the very different one of official reporting. I have a very strong opinion myself upon the subject, and when the occasion arises I shall ask leave to state why I am strongly opposed to a system of official reporting. However, that is a subject which it is perfectly competent for my hon. Friend to bring before the House whenever he pleases, and to move for a Committee; but the question which I submit ought not to be delayed until a Committee be appointed to report on an entirely different subject. Then as to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley). I do not see that it any way differs in principle from what I propose. I naturally prefer the form adopted in my Resolutions; but if the hon. and learned Member can show there is any advantage in the form which he has chosen, I should of course submit to the judgment of the House. I think the first of his Resolutions is objectionable for a reason I have already stated. I do not think it desirable that we should rescind any of our Rules which relate to Privilege. The Privileges which we possess have been established by the unbroken practice of centuries; and though it is easy to get rid of a Privilege, it is impossible for us to restore it when once it is given up. There is, however, one suggestion in the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Salford, which I shall be glad to adopt in the Resolutions I propose. The Chairman of Committee of the Whole House for the time being ought to have the same power as to the preservation of order and the exclusion of Strangers as the Speaker when the House is out of Committee. I have already stated that if the House should consider it necessary, I should not resist the adoption of a part of the Amendment to be proposed by the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge. I will not trouble the House any further. Hoping that the House will excuse me for the lengthened time I have occupied in the consideration of this important subject, and convinced of the extreme desirability of setting these somewhat troublesome and vexatious questions at rest, I humbly submit the Resolutions which I have placed on the Paper. The noble Marquess concluded by moving the first Resolution.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House will not entertain any complaint, in respect of the publication of the Debates or Proceedings of the House, or of any Committee thereof, except when any such Debates or Proceedings shall have been conducted with closed doors, or when such publication shall have been expressly prohibited by the House, or by any Committee, or in case of wilful misrepresentation, or other offence in relation to such publication."—(The Marquess of Hartington.)

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, the Amendment he had placed on the Paper

indicated the view which he thought ought to be carefully pressed on the House before it altered those fundamental privileges which had belonged to it from time immemorial. It indicated that they ought not to do in haste that which they might have to repent at leisure. There was a saying that hard cases made bad law, and this House itself had had experience of the fact that legislation under circumstances of temporary excitement sometimes led to inconvenient results. He would not refer at length to what had occurred in the present Session; but he thought there were few Members of the House who did not believe that if more time had been given for consideration, some of the Resolutions of the House this Session would not have been taken—he referred especially to the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis). It surely was essential that the House should not legislate on an important subject of this kind under the influence of panic. All he now asked the House to do was to pause for a moment, and consider if it had before it all the information which it ought to have in its possession in reference to those two important subjects—the Exclusion of Strangers and the reporting of the Debates. These two subjects were not necessarily connected with each other; but in the practice of the House they had a most intimate connection. The fact was that the power to exclude Strangers had necessarily excluded the reports of debates for many years. Gradually there had been a relaxation in the practice, so far as the presence of Strangers was concerned, and there was now a quasi-legal sanction of the reports of the proceedings of the House. But the right to exclude Strangers had done more to preserve the liberties of the subject in this country than any other measure. Without, therefore, offering any opinion at that moment as to whether the rule ought to be relaxed or altogether abrogated—on which subject possibly he had an opinion in accordance with that of the noble Marquess—he held that it would not be becoming in the House, suddenly and in consequence of what had taken place of late years, without adequate consideration, to make fundamental alterations in the laws of Parliament. What had occurred? His hon. and learned Friend the Member for Londonderry, in the exercise of his undoubted right, brought under the notice of the House certain circumstances that occurred in a Committee upstairs, and called upon the House to come to an immediate decision upon the question. The House did so; and the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister supported the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman to call the printers of certain newspapers to the Bar of the House. A little reflection, however, showed the right hon. Gentleman that it would be much better to take another course, and the result was that the printers in question were not called to the Bar of the House. This induced his hon. Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) to exercise the privilege which pertained to every Member of the House, and for the purpose in reality not of excluding Strangers, but of securing protection to those who reported the proceedings of the House, he directed attention to the presence of Strangers, and Mr. Speaker, having no option in the matter, Strangers were ordered to withdraw accordingly. The noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition then showed a desire to take up the subject, which had been in the minds of hon. Members for years past, but which no one had ever taken up in a serious spirit on account of the great difficulties attending it; and his hon. Friend the Member for Louth said at once that he would cease from putting his privilege in force in any manner that might be considered vexatious by the House. His hon. Friend the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) next, thinking that the threat—if he might use the term—of his hon. Friend the Member for Louth to repeat his Motion constantly had been dropped without adequate consideration, made a Motion for the exclusion of Strangers. The Motion was made at an inconvenient time, and very much against the feeling and spirit of the House. His hon. Friend the Member for Cavan had not repeated the Motion, and he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) thought he was able to say that, if this subject were really considered by the House, it was not his intention to do so. What did this show? It showed that for the preservation of the liberty of debate, and of the other privileges which were greater in the English House of Commons than in any other Assembly in the world, they must depend upon the good feeling of Members. The hon. Member for Cavan came from the North of Ireland. He belonged to that body of Protestants who were rightly considered to have a share of the virtue of persistency amounting, perhaps, sometimes to a suspicion of a shade of obstinacy; but the privileges of Englishmen had repeatedly been preserved by the exhibition of those very qualities of which they now complained. Nobody could deny that in Parliament, as elsewhere, individuals did sometimes trench upon the privileges with which they were entrusted as Members of that Assembly to an extent which a wider experience would not justify; but he doubted very much whether there was a single example in the history of Parliament of an individual entering the House of Commons, with no matter what prejudices against the House, who did not in the course of a very short time conform himself to the manners and customs of the House; and he did not believe that any hon. Gentleman would deny that a spirit of fair play governed their proceedings. It was that circumstance which had enabled them to preserve the liberties they enjoyed. Repeatedly Motions were made for the purpose of delay, both by individual Members and by Parties, and when the position of the two Parties in the House was reversed, he had frequently been in the division lobby until daylight was streaming through the windows. Under what circumstances? Because hon. Gentlemen opposite thought it their duty to offer all the opposition in their power to such questions as the abolition of Army Purchase. A few years ago, also, the right hon. Gentleman lately at the head of the Government, feeling very strongly in reference to the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill, thought it right, in the discharge of his duty—as might be seen, on reference to Hansard—to make upwards of 70 speeches, many of them long ones, in the course of the few weeks which elapsed during the progress of that measure. Were there any complaints of factious opposition at that time? Why, the very life of Parliament depended on factious opposition. It was repeatedly asked that they should adopt the practice which was followed in the French Assembly for limiting the time of debate by voting the clôture; but the House had had the good sense not to adopt any such restrictions, and he appealed to the House whether that liberty had been so abused as to become license;—whether, indeed, it had not preserved the life of Parliament, and in reality been used in conformity with the institutions and genius of the English people? In the American Congress they had adopted a rule, which was called the Five Minutes Rule. There, no Member was permitted to speak longer than one hour in introducing a measure, nor more than five minutes when the House was in Committee. This limitation was the result of not putting confidence in the good sense and good feeling of the Members, and he should strongly deprecate its adoption in this country. ["Question!"] All these limitations on the privileges of the House had been advocated on former occasions, in consequence of the privileges having been put into inconvenient action on particular questions. ["Question!"] He was about to show that although the exclusion of Strangers might be productive of inconvenience, other limitations on Parliamentary liberty elsewhere had resulted in great inconvenience, and he was asking the House to pause before consenting to limit its own privileges. He submitted, therefore, that what he was saying now was perfectly in Order. He contended, then, that it was not advisable, under the circumstances which had been brought before them suddenly, to alter the Rules of the House in reference to anything that had recently occurred in the House. Why was it that strangers were originally excluded from the House? He was not going to detain the House by reading extracts from constitutional histories on the subject; but everybody knew, or ought to know, that the jealousy which Parliament had shown at the presence of strangers was in consequence of the constitutional battle which the House of Commons fought against the Stuart Kings. They knew that at that time the King used to limit the subjects on which Parliament was to be allowed to speak its mind; and if anything was said that was disagreeable to the King, strong measures were the result. James I. tore out pages from the Journals of the House, and Charles I. went so far as to endeavour to seize five of its Members.

Mr. Mitchell Henry

No wonder, then, that the House of Commons, which required to deliberate without fear as to what the Crown might do, should have been extremely jealous of its power to prevent the publication of its debates, and consequently of the presence of Strangers. But the battle had been fought out many years ago; they were not now afraid of the interference of the Crown, and did not maintain the privilege which their ancestors had handed down to them on any such ground as that. There were other reasons, however, why they ought to preserve their privileges; but before going into that, he would say that there was this objection to the Resolutions of the noble Marquess—that the privilege to exclude Strangers did not belong to the House of Commons alone. It was a privilege of Parliament, and all their privileges were privileges dependent upon the action of Parliament—that was, both Houses of Parliament, confirmed by the Sovereign; and he held that it would not be a seemly thing to make a fundamental alteration in that privilege without some conference with the other House of Parliament. The other House had a right to know something of the proceedings of the House of Commons in this matter. He did not deny, indeed, that this House possessed the right of deciding how it would exercise its privilege; but it could not create a new privilege, and it did not possess one which was not equally shared by the other House of Parliament. That view of the question might or might not commend itself to the approval of hon. Gentlemen; but, at any rate, it commended itself to considerable constitutional authorities, and that was another reason why the House should pause.

He now came to another matter which was intimately mixed up with this—that was, the reports of their debates. If he excepted Mr. Craufurd's Motion two or three Sessions ago, the privilege of excluding Strangers had not been exercised in modern times save for the purpose of insuring adequate and correct reports of the debates. In every instance in which it was proposed to exclude Strangers, including, of course, the reporters, it had been made because individual Members thought they had a right to complain of the reports of their speeches. Was there any foundation for that? In former times, there was nothing for which the public had so great an appetite as the reports of the proceedings of Parliament. Those were the days when questions of Constitutional Law or great reforms in the customs of this country were under consideration. At the close of the last century the greatest efforts were made, in spite of perils, to give the public reports of the proceedings of the House of Commons. The Times, The Morning Chronicle, The Morning Herald, and other newspapers, established their reputations in very great measure by the fullness and accuracy with which they reported Parliamentary debates. Lord Campbell, Charles Dickens, and a great many other distinguished men had been Parliamentary reporters, and though he did not mean for a moment to say that there were not equally distinguished persons now engaged in that occupation, yet he certainly must state that, as a general rule, the reports of the debates had entirely changed in their character. The leading journal, The Times, gave very full reports, and so did one other morning paper. The other papers, however, rightly considering that they ought not to occupy space, which to them was money, with matter which would not be generally interesting to the public, cut down the debates to the very smallest dimensions. Moreover, there had crept into the House of Commons the practice of sensational reporting. Sketches of what occurred, or of what was supposed to have occurred, were given to the public. The appearance of Members and their manners were described, although, God knew! Gentlemen who worked till 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning might be excused if sometimes they were a little ungainly in their manners. These matters were, however, made the subjects of sensational sketches. [An hon. MEMBER: Caricatures.] Yes, caricatures, as his right hon. Friend observed. He did not object to this for a moment; but he asked the House of Commons to consider the position in which it was placed. When the Corn Laws were in debate, one of the strongest complaints made by Mr. Cobden was that the arguments of those who spoke on his side of the question were never fairly put before the public, and he complained as much of The Times as of any other newspaper. He said that the arguments of those who opposed Free Trade were put fully before the public, whilst those which were in its favour were condensed to the utmost. It was even in contemplation to try to prevent such things as summaries of the debates in which the arguments were placed so much on one side, whilst the reply was almost suppressed. This was one of the strongest arguments for the "freedom of literature" as it was called, and the repeal of the duty on paper. It was then said—"If you establish a cheap Press, you will have full and accurate reports of the debates in Parliament. Those reports will be diffused throughout the length and breadth of the land, and people who read the arguments on one side will then have an opportunity of reading those on the other." The very reverse had happened. Owing to the great extension of telegraphic enterprize; to the rapidity with which everything was done now-a-days; to the short time people had at their disposal; and to the appetite which of late years had been created for sensational writing, the reports of the debates in Parliament were, with very few exceptions, most farcical, and, as he thought, not altogether creditable to the taste of the people of England. The newspapers, which were multiplying everywhere, and doing so much good, gave condensed reports of what took place in Parliament; not in the shape of reports, however, but as sensational sketches. People in the country received these reports in the morning in their local newspapers, through the medium of the telegraph. Those paragraphs satisfied their appetite for political information; the consequence was, that they never referred to the debates which took place in this House, never read the other side of the question, and thus their views were altogether warped on great public questions. Perhaps some hon. Members might say this was an evil which corrected itself, and might ask—"Do you mean to assert that we ought to publish our reports in order to educate the people?" Well, he meant to say that the expectations of those who instituted the cheap Press in the hope of widely diffusing political information, founded on the debates of this House, had been disappointed. He meant to say that the cheap Press of this country did not give to the people those full reports of the debates in Parliament which it was expected they would do when the

Press laws were reformed. He had made this matter the subject of very careful inquiry, because he regarded it in a serious light, and he had not made these observations in any spirit of hostility to the Press; but the House of Commons ought to know what it was going to do before it proceeded to legislate on the question, and he thought the statements which he had made, and which, if the House would bear with him, he would yet make, were worthy of being inquired into by a Select Committee of the House. Of late years there had sprung up a system of Telegraphic Press Agencies. Two of these agencies had seats among the reporters of the proceedings of this House: one was the Central Press; the other the Press Association. What happened?—and here he begged the attention of the House to what he was going to say. Both these extensive organizations had their own reporters, who wrote out in manifold, and telegraphed to different provincial newspapers the reports of the debates of the House. The Central News—another association—had a list of hon. Members whose speeches were to be carefully and accurately reported. [Sir HENRY JAMES: Name!] The lists of the Associations extended to upwards of 200 Members of the House, whose speeches were to be telegraphed at full length to various provincial newspapers; and he did not complain of that; but he would observe that a speech made by an hon. Member would appear at full length in the local paper which was the organ of his views, and with which he was en rapport, whilst the speech of the Prime Minister on the same subject would be compressed into the smallest possible space. Thus the people of England got very imperfect political information. Some surprising things had occurred of late in connection with the return of a particular Member to this House; and he verily believed that the working men of Stoke, and others who had petitioned the House in a certain notorious case, were influenced in the conduct they had pursued by the fact of their political information upon many subjects being altogether one-sided. He had no doubt, however, that hon. Members had read the articles which had appeared in the newspapers—and especially in The Spectator—upon the subject, or could imagine for themselves what was the constitutional argument respecting it. But he came now to another point. The Reporters' Gallery was occupied exclusively by the representatives of the London Press, and the London Press had changed its views with regard to the debates of the House. Two or three of the London daily newspapers gave very full and accurate reports of the debates; the others found it was better for their own interest—and no doubt they thought conscientiously that it was for the interest of the public also—to compress their reports into the very smallest dimensions, and to substitute personal sketches for full reports of the arguments which were used. But he contended that as long as the dimensions of the Reporters' Gallery were restricted, and as long as the Provincial Press was prevented from coming into that Gallery, a responsibility was imposed upon those who enjoyed the privilege of entrance into the Gallery which carried with it a very sacred obligation. If the House of Commons adopted the principle that reports of the debates were to be carried on in the interest of newspapers, he would not object in the smallest degree, because he thought it was the only true principle; but if that principle were adopted, it would necessitate something else—namely, an authentic record of what occurred in that House for the information of its Members. Theirs was perhaps the only Assembly in the world which had not something in the shape of an official record of its debates and proceedings; and it was a matter of pride and boast with them that the Parliament of England had, with the aid of the Press, for so many years achieved that which other countries had only been able to accomplish through the assistance of their Governments. A great many persons believed that Hansard's Debates were a kind of official record of the proceedings of that House. He was quite certain that that was the impression out-of-doors, and he believed it to be the impression of a great number of Members of that House. Now, Hansard's Debates originated in the year 1803, and through the enterprize of a son of the late Mr. Luke Hansard, who had been so long connected with the printing of the House, these Debates had supplied Parliament with a very accurate record of its proceedings. They were cited continually in the House, and so great was their reputation that even in Prussia they had a Proussisches Hansard; there was also a Hansard's Debates both in Canada and Australia. But was the House aware that the private enterprize in this country known as Hansard's Debates had not a single reporter in the Gallery of the House? Hansard's Debates were made up in this way:—The best report that could be obtained from a newspaper of a Member's speech was taken by the able proprietor. He carefully collated it with the reports in other newspapers, printed it, and sent it to the Member who delivered the speech for correction. Hon. Members who valued what they said—and every body ought to speak with deliberation in that House—having given thought beforehand to the subject under discussion, would take the pains to correct those reports, where necessary, and return them to the proprietor of Hansard, who would then publish them. But it was well known that these Debates were carried on for many years at an actual loss to the proprietor, and at the present moment he understood—and he was stating nothing that he was not entitled to state—the remuneration derived from them was not such as would induce anybody to continue Hansard's Debates unless he were imbued with that esprit which was so characteristic of Englishmen—the desire of a man who had inherited a reputation for a great work from his father and grandfather to carry on that work, though almost at a loss. Now, the House of Commons subscribed for 120 copies of Hansard's Parliamentary Debates; and that was all the assistance which it gave to that publication. Suppose, then, that these Debates came to an end to-morrow; suppose the present proprietor, who derived so little pecuniary emolument from them, but certainly in the opinion of this and foreign countries a great amount of honour for his laborious and patriotic enterprize; suppose that honourable gentleman were to discontinue the publication of the Debates, or if he paid the debt of nature, and they were not continued by some one else, in what position would the House of Commons then be placed? Where would they have any authentic record of the proceedings of the House so far as debate and argument were concerned? They could not bring in and cite the reports of newspapers, because there was a Standing Order against it. True, they might suspend the Standing Order; but the newspapers would not supply them with the materials which were now contained in Hansard. It was impossible that the newspapers could report the proceedings of the House at sufficient length. ["Divide!"] He presumed that the Gentlemen who cried "Divide!" subscribed to the Press Associations, and he commended them for it; but he was stating facts which he had laboriously and carefully collected, and he thought it was hardly becoming in hon. Members to endeavour to silence him at that early hour. Well, if these Debates came to an end, the question would be brought to a crisis, and they would be obliged to find a substitute. He had referred to various points which he thought might with propriety be inquired into by a Committee. He did not offer a complete plan to the House; but he would briefly indicate what he considered might be very fairly done. He was of opinion that private enterprize should be left exactly where it was, and that the debates and proceedings of the House ought to be free to the newspapers to report at as great length or as shortly as they pleased; but he thought they ought also to have—and that the time had come when it was essential that they should have—a distinct official record of their proceedings. The House might be deterred from entering into that question from a fear of the expense which it would involve. Now, in the United States of America they had a Congressional Record which cost an enormous sum. Congress distributed not less than 13,000 copies amongst its own Members, and the expense was very recently upwards of £50,000 a-year. But if the House of Commons desired to have official and authentic reports of the debates for itself, it would be quite feasible to obtain them in this simple manner:—One reporter, sitting somewhere in the House, could take down everything that occurred in the course of debate, just as fully and accurately as the proceedings before Committees were taken down. The shorthand notes would be taken away and transcribed by assistants, as was now done in Committees, and next morning there might be placed on the Table of the House an exact record, in manuscript, of everything that had taken place of a public nature, exactly as the Journals of the House were now placed on the Table; or, if it were thought desirable to have it in print, it might be printed at a small expense. He had made inquiries on the subject, and believed he was within the mark when he said that £8,000 or £9,000 a-year would be sufficient for supplying accurate records of the debates and proceedings of the House, and giving every Member of the House a volume of the Debates at the end of each Session; and that record might be sent to every hon. Member just as early as were the reports published by the newspapers. If that were done, he believed that the newspapers themselves would take their reports from that accurate official record, and would subscribe to the expense of it; for the House must know that the newspapers did not value the privilege of reporting its debates. ["Oh!"] He repeated, and he had it upon the highest authority, that the newspapers themselves did not value the privilege of reporting the debates of that House. ["Oh!" and "Divide!"] They said that it did not pay; that the public desired to have some other kind of information, and that they must find what the public wished to have. Therefore, it was quite possible, it had even been threatened by newspaper proprietors, that they might agree to cease reporting the debates. The House must not then go on upon the supposition that the liberty of reporting its debates was a privilege that was greatly valued by the newspapers on account of any pecuniary advantage which it gave them; and he thought that the public were greatly indebted to those public-spirited proprietors who did in some instances continue the publication of accurate reports. That remark, however, applied to two or three of the leading journals only: it did not apply to the cheap Press generally, and the cheap Press did not desire that it should apply to them. They did not think it their duty to give full and accurate reports; they did not profess to do so, because it did not pay. He had shown clearly—["No, no!"]—he had shown clearly—["No!"]—well, he had endeavoured to show clearly, that the whole conditions of reporting had changed; and if the conditions of reporting had changed, he was of opinion that the House of Commons ought to inquire carefully into the matter.

With that object, what harm could the appointment of a Select Committee do? Such a Committee, if it made careful inquiries, would collect information that would guide the House in arriving at accurate conclusions. If they considered that no change was necessary, the House could but allow the thing to go on as it did at present. If, on the contrary, they recommended that a change should be made, the House would at any rate be in a position to decide with full information before it. ["Divide!"] Of course, the 200 Gentlemen who were certain of having their speeches reported in their local newspapers were quite entitled to cry "Divide!" when this important subject was under consideration; but there was something more concerned than placing the reports of those hon. Members before their constituents, and that was the supplying of political information to the country, the diffusion of which had hitherto tended so much to the prosperity of this Kingdom. He had shown, at least, that the conditions of reporting had changed, and he contended that until the reports of the debates and proceedings of the House were placed on some definite footing, it was absolutely essential that the power should be left in the hands of individual Members of exercising some control over the reports that appeared of their speeches. The only control that could be exercised was that old constitutional one of excluding Strangers, which had only been enforced on rare occasions and that for a few moments of time. They might abrogate that privilege if they liked, and afterwards discover that they had done so without adequate information, and he thought that they were now asked to do it without that adequate information before them. The privilege relating to the exclusion of Strangers, and that which concerned the reporting of their debates, were mixed up with each other, and there were circumstances which affected each that the House ought to be thoroughly acquainted with before it came to what might otherwise be a premature decision on the subject. He therefore begged to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words

"it is not expedient to make any permanent alteration in the Rules relative to the Reports of the Debates or Proceedings of the House, or of any Committee thereof, or as to the presence of strangers in the House, until the House has more fully considered the present system of reporting its proceedings with the aid of information to be obtained by the appointment of a Select Committee,"—(Mr. Mitchell Henry),

—instead thereof.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Mr. Speaker, I am not disposed to differ from the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for Galway—that this House ought to consider maturely before parting with a Privilege which has been declared by your immediate Predecessor in the Chair to be an inherent Privilege of Parliament not dependent upon a Rule of this House. It is this Privilege so declared to be inherent in Parliament we are now asked to modify, if not to abrogate. I cannot think that the circumstances on which the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) rests his proposal adequate to the occasion. What has happened in the present Session to render the proposal necessary, except that there has been an abrupt disregard of the Rules and customs of Parliament not confined to this ancient Privilege? At the beginning of the Session, in order to admit the hon. Member for Stoke (Dr. Kenealy) to a seat in this House, the House was induced to suspend a Rule as to a new Member appearing with sponsors, which has existed for 200 years, and that Rule was suspended without Notice. I was a Member of this House when a great question arose with regard to altering the oaths which were taken, first, in the case of persons belonging to the Jewish persuasion, and afterwards in the case of Roman Catholic Members. I have seen the Rules of this House and the Privilege of Parliament tested over and over again, and wherever a question of this sort arose, which seemed to threaten the abrogation of a Standing Order or to involve a question of law, it was the custom of the House to adjourn the consideration of such question in order to search for precedents, so that the House might not be led to adopt a hasty decision. That was done when Baron Rothschild presented himself at the Table to be sworn.

It was also done in the case of the late Sir David Salomons. Again, we have had a question of Privilege raised, and this House found itself in a difficulty owing to having arrived at a premature decision. Had the ancient custom of the House been observed, and the question of Privilege arising out of the publication of a scandalous letter, which was tendered to one of our Committees, been adjourned, the painful fact of this House having to reverse its decision could not have occurred. Again, in the case of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), when he called attention to the presence of Strangers in the House, if he had been permitted to assign his reasons for doing so in the first instance, it would have been found that his reasons were inadequate, and the Speaker would have been desired to recall the Strangers. Instead of which the House was asked, without Notice, and on the spur of the moment, to suspend its Standing Orders so far as this Privilege was concerned, because it was presumed that the hon. Member for Cavan was about to behave himself in a contumacious manner. I then rose in my place and suggested to the hon. Member that when any hon. Member exercised his privilege of calling your attention, Sir, to the fact that Strangers were present, it was always customary for that hon. Member to assign his reasons for doing so. The hon. Member for Cavan immediately complied, and, in complying, showed that there was no adequate occasion for his having used his privilege, and that the usual practice would have been amply sufficient, for that hon. Member's reasons were deemed inadequate, and you, Sir, would have been requested to direct the Serjeant-at-Arms to open the Galleries and re-admit Strangers. The whole of these difficulties have arisen from abrupt and premature action on the part of this House, and would not have occurred had the former practice of the House been observed, and the House had taken time to consider the question which had arisen. I am not inclined, therefore, to be hasty in adopting the Resolutions of the noble Lord, though in saying this I do not mean to imply that he is acting without having received advice. But, in my opinion, the recurrences of these abrupt proceedings, endangering at once the privilege of hon. Members and the Rules and Standing Orders of the House, demands the grave consideration of a Committee chosen from among the leading Members of the House. The Privilege of causing the exclusion of Strangers has, it is true, on some few occasions been abused. It was so by the late Mr. John O'Connell was a Member of this House. But the case in which the hon. and learned Member for Ayrshire (Mr. Craufurd) used that Privilege was very different. The consideration of the Contagious Diseases Act was to come before the House. The hon. and learned Member for Ayrshire used his privilege; but he assigned, as a reason, his belief that the debate which was about to arise, must be of a nature detrimental to public morality, and dangerous to the character of the House. There might be, and there was, a difference of opinion upon this; but no one could pretend to believe that there was no ground for that opinion. I cannot consider that the hon. and learned Member for Ayrshire abused his privilege, nor can I think ground sufficient for abrogating that Privilege exists. I must say that the reasons given by the hon. Member for advocating the modern abuse of this Privilege are to my mind very unsatisfactory. It would be the establishment of a vicious practice if the House were to countenance such an idea as that any hon. Member who deemed that his speeches were not sufficiently reported would be justified in using his privilege of calling attention to the presence of Strangers, and thus excluding all reporters from the Gallery. That would be a manifest abuse of the Privilege. But, then, we have our remedy; and if a Member were to assign such a reason as that for the exercise of his privilege, the House has an ample remedy. If a Member acted against the sense of the House and in abuse of this Privilege, the first remedy would be that you, Sir, should be instructed to reprimand that Member by name. Then, if he proved contumacious, the next process would be that you should be instructed to order the Member to be taken into custody. And the third remedy, in the event of his continued contumacy, is that the House, after due deliberation, might expel him from the House. Having such ample remedies in our hands, I am unwilling, without calm deliberation, to part with a Privilege which has been declared by one of the highest authorities that ever adorned the Chair of this House to be an inherent Privilege of Parliament, anterior and superior to any Standing Orders, and even to any Privileges conferred by Statute. But the hon. Member for Galway has touched upon another question—the manner in which the debates of this House are reported. Well, Sir, a great change has taken place in the reports of our debates. I hold in my hand the declaration made only yesterday on this subject by one of the leading newspapers of this country—I mean The Daily News. I quote from this article in order to show that the conductors of the public Press no longer intend to report our debates so fully as formerly. The Daily News has now for some time ceased to report our debates in extenso, and thus writes in explanation of the purpose of its conductors—

“Mr. Mitchell Henry intends, we take it for granted, to call attention to the necessity of providing full reports of the debates of the House of Commons. This, we need hardly say, the daily newspapers do not do, do not pretend to accomplish, and could not possibly accomplish consistently with their general purposes as purveyors of news and representatives of opinion. The speeches of the leading statesmen on both sides of the House are reported, and what we may call fully reported, on almost all occasions when the lateness of the hour does not render such a report impossible in morning papers which are almost immediately about to go to press. But all ordinary Members of Parliament find that, except on very remarkable occasions, their speeches are compressed into mere summaries. Debates of great interest to localities, and even to kingdoms, are often summarized in a few lines of a London paper. This is simply unavoidable. No London paper could exist which inflicted upon its readers a full report every morning of the proceedings of Parliament to the exclusion of other matter. Take, for example, the debates on the Irish Peace Preservation Bill.”

Here, then, is a clear declaration; and I am informed that with the exception of two leading newspapers, it is highly probable that the system of summarizing our debates will be carried still further. The writer goes on to say—

“At all events, it is certain that this habit of commenting is growing into fuller development day by day, and in all free countries. . . . The idea that the Press Gallery is only or even especially a gallery where persons are to sit who are to report the debates ought to be frankly given up in our days. Such was the case really at one time, but such certainly is not the case now.”

This, Sir, is information which comes to us from no doubtful source. It is information which I find contained in a leading article in one of the most talented papers in the country, and it brings before the House the fact that the system of reporting our debates as heretofore practised so greatly to the advantage of Parliament, and the country is, in the case of several newspapers, if not in all, to be given up. I am fully sensible of the fact myself; and who can be surprised at it? True, we may hope to have still the speeches of the Prime Minister and of the Leader of the Opposition, also of other right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who are or may have been in office, well reported; but The Daily News states the plain truth, when it says that Parliament must not look forward to the continuance of the system of reporting its debates which has heretofore prevailed. The reports of our debates have to compete with the acceleration of intelligence by means of the railways, through which news from the most distant countries reaches London in one-third of the time it formerly did; whilst the system of telegraphing, if it has not annihilated space, has positively annihilated time in the transmission of intelligence. Each daily paper, therefore, if it is to compete with its fellows, must furnish news from every quarter of the globe. Telegrams giving information as to the policy and diplomacy of foreign countries, as to the prospect of war or the hope of peace, as to the transmission of bullion, as to the state of the markets for various products, as to the whereabouts of ships on different parts of the ocean, and even as to the circulation of storms. These are all subjects of the deepest interest to various classes of the community, and this is additional matter which competes for space in the columns of newspapers with the debates of this House. This House owes an enormous debt to the gentlemen who have occupied that Gallery. Amongst them has sat one who was afterwards Lord Chancellor of England—the late Lord Campbell—and I might enumerate the names of many gentlemen who once occupied seats in the Gallery, but who have risen to the greatest eminence in literature, and other pursuits. I believe that they would willingly do us justice; but whatever their talents, they cannot overcome the commercial necessities of the newspapers, while competing with each other, which forbid their reporting the debates in Parliament so fully as is desirable, and as was formerly done. I would, therefore, urge upon this House that the time has come when, warned as we have been by Mr. Hansard that his valuable publication has ceased to be remunerative, the House should consider how it can hereafter preserve an adequate record of its debates. I do not desire that the House should follow the example of the Legislative Assembly in France, where a most elaborate system of reporting the debates is carried on, nor even adopt the system of Austria, nor the system of Italy, nor the system of the United States, which, having formerly been conducted by contract, has within the last few months been vested in an executive appointed by the House of Assembly. All the House ought to consider is this—whether it will not appoint a staff of qualified reporters, who should be at liberty to assist the Press; but, at the same time, should be bound to preserve for Parliament—not for this House only, but for both Houses—a reliable record of their debates, and so supply, if necessary, the place which Hansard has so long and so ably filled. I do not for one moment lend myself to the idea that these reports are to be used merely for the gratification of the constituents of hon. Members. But I say that the value which is attached to Hansard both in England and in our Colonies, proves that a record of the debates, opinions, and proceedings of the Imperial Legislature is essential to the preservation of free institutions, as well as a valuable work of reference. My belief is that we can have no better security against speeches made in this House for the mere purpose of delay or obstruction than the preservation of a reliable record of what is said on such occasions by hon. Members, who seek to interrupt or delay our proceedings. It is thus, and thus only, I believe, that public opinion can be brought in support of the order and the dignity of this House.

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, the House is indebted to the noble Lord the Leader of the Opposition for having introduced this question to its notice. I view the course he has taken with no envy, although I was appealed to in the first instance to undertake the task. Having served upon one or two Committees of the House, by whom this subject has been investigated, and having had the advantage of doing that in the days and under the auspices of very eminent men, some of the most learned Members of Parliament with regard to the great subject of Parliamentary law and privilege who have hitherto adorned this Assembly—in the days of Lord Eversley and Lord Ossington, and I might say in the days of men still living, whom we greatly respect, and deplore that they are not Members of this House at present—I mean such men as Sir George Grey and Mr. Bouverie—I confess I declined the task from a conviction of my inability to meet the difficulties which have baffled spirits of so much higher temper than myself, and not having that confidence in the easy solution of this question which the noble Lord has recommended to our attention to-night. Having examined these Resolutions, I find that they deal with two subjects, one being the publication of our proceedings, and the other our recognition of the presence of Strangers. These are the two subjects to which the noble Lord has given his particular attention, and it is upon these he asks to-night not only for the deliberation, but for the determination of the House. With regard to the first—the publication of our proceedings—I observe that in the first Resolution the noble Lord, while he calls upon the House “not to entertain any complaint in respect of the publication of the debates or proceedings of the House,” makes so many exceptions and so many conditions that, when practically considered, I think the House may be induced to believe that the carrying of the first Resolution of the noble Lord would not debar any Member from the Privileges to which it refers, and which are by some deemed inconvenient, while at the same time it might add fresh obstacles to the freedom of our conduct in respect to the management of our debates. The noble Lord asks us to determine—

“That this House will not entertain any complaint, in respect of the publication of the Debates or Proceedings of the House, or of any Committee thereof, except when any such debates or proceedings shall have been conducted with closed doors, or when such publication shall have been expressly prohibited by the House, or by any Committee, or in case of wilful misrepresentation, or other offence in relation to such publication.”

Surely under such an enactment as that there is scarcely a publication made under those circumstances which an hon. Gentleman might not challenge. For instance, who is to decide as to what is wilful misrepresentation? Any hon. Gentleman who would bring forward a complaint of that sort would himself be convinced that the misrepresentation was wilful; and therefore no Resolution of this kind would debar him from seeking the justice which he demanded. Who is to annex any definite idea to the words “or other offence in relation to such publication?” If any Member is to have the right of bringing up this question of Privilege, he may have no great difficulty in asserting it. Then, again, under this first Resolution, although it seems to me no Member would be debarred from taking that course which has excited so much attention, and which was exercised by an hon. Member the other night, the House would be fettered by language such as that “this House will not entertain any complaint in respect of the publication of the Debates or Proceedings of the House.” Is it wise under a Resolution which seems to leave untouched the power which each Member has of standing on his privilege that we should seek to fetter the general authority of the House, and agree, by this limiting language, that we will not entertain any complaint with respect to the publication of our debates and proceedings? I think myself the House should pause before assenting to a proposal which would add to our restrictions, while at the same time it would not save us from any of the inconvenience of which some hon. Members had occasion recently to complain. So much for the first Resolution; and now I come to the second, which relates to the presence of Strangers, the exercise of the Privilege of excluding whom has within the last few days excited some disquiet in the House. In the first place, with respect to a recent instance, I cannot altogether admit that the inconvenience caused by that exercise of Privilege was very great, or that the House was taken by surprise. So far as I am concerned, I had not much time to consider the particular case to which I refer; but I had received an intimation that the difficulty connected with it would be promptly and easily removed by some Member of the Committee making a communication to the House, without violating any of the Rules with reference to not making public what had occurred in the Committee beyond that which related to the document in question. In consequence, however, of a misconception on my part, and on the part of many others, we were landed in a momentary inconvenience. But how did we rescue ourselves from that? By asserting the power which rests in the House—by passing a Resolution which removed the difficulty just as in the case of the notice of the presence of Strangers, which is the subject of the second Resolution, we extricated ourselves from difficulty by appealing to the power which we have of suspending the Standing Orders. In both these cases, therefore—the publication of reports of our proceedings or the presence of Strangers—it seems the House has a power in its hands which will extricate it from any difficulty. With regard to the presence of Strangers, I may say, in case the House should decide to make any alteration with respect to the exercise of Privilege, I should be most anxious that the power of the Speaker and the Chairman of Committees should be asserted and established in no ambiguous manner. On this subject I must refer to what occurred in the Committee of 1871. That question was discussed and the Committee divided in equal numbers. I would refer the House to the names of those of the Committee who were in favour of retaining the present system. Among those names were those of Sir George Grey and Mr. Bouverie, men of considerable station in the House, and both of them voted for the maintenance of the present system. Now, it is highly important that the House should have a clear conception of what they are going to decide upon. When you come to analyze what we have to decide upon, the House will find that there really are only two points—one as to the restrictions with regard to the publication of debates; and the other as regards the presence of Strangers in the Galleries. Now in neither of these cases—and these are practically all we are called upon to decide—does it appear to me that it is necessary to interfere with the present state of things. I say this with great diffidence, because this is a question on which we ought, undoubtedly, to endeavour to obtain the opinion of the House, and to draw from the experience of its Members some results which will carry universal concurrence. But if you come to either of these two points, I think the House must feel that they have the power of redress in their own hands if there is any abuse of Privilege; and it is extremely desirable that when we are dealing with subjects of this kind we should not take any rash step. We should remember that these are Privileges which we have possessed long—which we have often exercised, which may have been sometimes exercised with some inconvenience and not always with sufficient reason, but that the general result has been favourable to the order and decorum of the House of Commons. Now, there is another question connected with this matter which has been developed at considerable length, and with great variety of illustration, by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), and the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), appears to sympathize with his observations. It concerns the mode by which an ample and correct report of all speeches in this House shall be secured. What those hon. Members want, I presume, is a Speech Preservation Act. I know from experience in these matters that it is an extremely difficult subject to deal with, and that it would take so much time in carrying that the probability would be, as has happened in other matters, that we might not be successful in carrying any other measure during the Session. I am not prepared at present to support a Speech Preservation Act to meet the difficulty experienced by the hon. Member for Galway and re-echoed by the hon. Member for Warwickshire. The real point which the House ought to consider at the present moment is this—Will you do that which I hold is one of the unwise things you could do in legislation? Will you attempt to codify the common law of Parliament? As a general rule it is most unwise to attempt to codify common law. These privileges belong to the common law of Parliament. They are the result of the experience of many generations—I might say of many centuries. There is wisdom embalmed in them which may not be at the moment evident, but which we find out sooner or later in practice. It is by the observance of these Rules—it is by the jealousy with which all the most eminent

Members of this House for a long period have watched any attempt to tamper with those Privileges, that we have a common law of Parliament so powerful and beneficial as the present. I do not mean to say that it may not be a question some day for the House to consider whether it may or may not be in the power of an individual to notice the presence of Strangers, or whether we should not, under the circumstances, make some restrictions in the exercise of that Privilege; but, so far as I can judge, the remedy being ready and prompt, if the House chooses to exercise it, I should hesitate, for a doubtful benefit, to make any change. There is one point which I wish to put before the House on this subject, and that is that this House should perfectly recollect that with regard to the presence of Strangers you could not have a debate as to whether Strangers should withdraw without entering at the same time into a discussion upon the subject upon which Strangers were requested to withdraw, and I do not think anything would be more inconvenient than an occurrence of that kind. Upon the whole, therefore, I hope the House will not agree to the Resolutions which have been laid before it. I give credit to the noble Lord for the effort he has made to meet the difficulties of the case. He has come forward to assist us, and if he has not solved the Gordian knot he has failed only where men equal to him in station and ability have failed before him. Remembering the labours of the great Committees which during the last quarter of a century have been nominated by the House to consider this subject, I confess myself that on both points—as to the publication of our proceedings and the presence of Strangers—it would be wise for us, without greater experience of inconvenience than we have yet seen, not to assent to any change of the common law of Parliament.

MR. LOWE: The right hon. Gentleman has made a very clear and definite deliverance on this subject, and I am happy to say it is impossible to misunderstand or misrepresent it. He is clearly of opinion that the state of the law of Parliament is so satisfactory that no alteration of it is required. The question is, whether the law is in that satisfactory state? If the objections taken to the law be vexatious, frivolous, and unsuited to the dignity of the House, of course the right hon. Gentleman's opinion will prevail; if, on the other hand, they are founded upon grounds so commanding and convincing that it is hardly possible to state them without bringing conviction to the mind, then, notwithstanding the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman, I cannot help hoping there is patriotism enough in Parliament to make them succeed. What is the first proposition of the right hon. Gentleman?—that there is no necessity for alteration of the law of Parliament as regards the publication of our debates. He says this is a common law of Parliament, and it has been framed with great wisdom and judgment by the great men who have gone before us. It is quite true it was so framed, but with what object? Why did they declare it a breach of Privilege to report the debates of Parliament? Because it enabled the King, or the men who surrounded him, to send the great and able men who took part in those debates to prison and leave them to perish there. It was to protect Members of the House from the fate of Sir John Eliot, for instance, who, for defending the liberties of the country, was thrown into prison in 1628, and kept there until he died. For that purpose nothing could be better than saying that a publication which would produce a peril to the liberty of Members was a breach of the Privileges of the House. But the times have changed. So far from wishing our proceedings to be kept secret; so far from fearing any overbearing power to call us to account for what we say, the House has no greater desire than that its proceedings should have the greatest possible publicity. It is not from any feeling of vanity on the part of hon. Gentlemen in reading the reports of their speeches; it is because we have here a power by which we can influence the country, by which we can propagate those beliefs which we regard as being calculated to advance the common good. What was to our predecessors a fear and a dread has become to us a delight and an honour, that which they used all their efforts to repress and control we use all our efforts to extend; and, therefore, though they were wise in using every effort to keep the proceedings in Parliament secret, it does not follow that we are not equally wise in a diametrically opposite position in seeking to make them public. That, I think, disposes, without any degree of irreverence, of the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman. Let us go a little further. What is the present state of the case? It is actually this—that while our most earnest desire is that our proceedings should be published to the British nation and to the whole world, and while we are conscious of deriving from it a power perfectly astonishing even to ourselves, the law and wisdom of Parliament are that the very doing of that which we all desire is a crime, for the doing of which a man can be dragged as a criminal to the Bar of this House, for which he can be interrogated as he can be interrogated in no other Court in this Kingdom, and can be cast into prison. That is the system under which we agree to promote that which we all agree in desiring. We take these persons; we call them before us; we take them away from the jurisdiction of the Common Law, and we submit them to this interrogation, admitting all the while that they have done nothing wrong at all. I am not going to allude to anything that was said in this House with respect to the Committee of which I am Chairman. But look at what was done. It was wished to extract some information which could not be got from me, for they could not send me to prison. And so a happy device was hit upon. Something was published, and we all admit for the benefit of the whole country, and without the slightest discredit or blame to the persons who merely did their duties in publishing it. Therefore, one person being guilty and another quite innocent, it occurred to an hon. Member that this rule, which the right hon. Gentleman says ought on no account to be altered, could be applied with some effect. That is to say, we were to treat persons who were perfectly innocent as if they were criminals, drag them here from their business, and obtain evidence from them by a process unknown to any other Court, which evidence was to be used for some other purpose. Then we are told that there is nothing in all this which needs amendment, and that this is the way in which the dignity and the character of Parliament are to be preserved. Now, the people of this country have no great respect for legal fiction, and I think they will understand clearly that if it is true that it is a great benefit to us all that these things should be published, it cannot be a crime to publish them. If we build Galleries to enable our proceedings to be published, if we give facilities for doing so, if you, Mr. Speaker, allow quotations from the newspaper reports of Parliament to be made, how can we maintain any sort of dignity or character before the eyes of the people of this country if we allow any gentleman who wants to extract any information to be used against any one, to drag these people to the Bar and extract it from them upon pain of imprisonment when they have committed no crime whatever. This, I think, is an answer to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as to there being no necessity for change in respect of the laws relating to the breach of Privilege. Since the right hon. Gentleman objects it is quite useless for me to go into detail, because he is content with things as they are. The only thing, therefore, that I have to do is to put it to the House whether it agrees with the right hon. Gentleman on the subject. Then comes the second case. The right hon. Gentleman sees no occasion to alter the law, which says that any Member of Parliament may desire Strangers to withdraw, and that they should withdraw accordingly. I venture to say that the way in which the law has been acted upon has not been creditable to the dignity of Parliament. The Strangers who have been turned out have immediately been allowed to come back again—and that is not a dignified connivance on the part of this House. If this is a rule to be insisted upon by Parliament it ought not to be evaded in this manner. Now, this law is traceable to the same source, to prevent the report of proceedings in Parliament lest Parliament should be prejudiced. But the whole nature of things has been changed, and it is not conceivable that human wisdom can be such that framing certain measures to meet one evil, they can be applied to meet an evil exactly contrary. But what has happened? An hon. Gentleman takes it into his head that he will exercise this Privilege. From that moment he is our master; he brings every one of us on his knees. Whatever the Member may be, whether important or otherwise, matters nothing; he becomes our King for the time being, and everyone begs and entreats that he will not exercise his power. But who gave him that power? What induces us now to place ourselves at the feet of any man who chooses to exert his mastery over us? If the whole of this House wishes that its proceedings should be open except one man, what sense or reason is it that one man should be able to prevent it? There is nothing that I am aware of in our Constitution or history which should induce us to give to one single man the power to do what was done the other day—on the approach of a most interesting and harmless discussion to stop our proceedings and absolutely to turn out the Heir Apparent. We have been told that we were gentlemen first and Members of Parliament afterwards; but if every Member has the right properly vested in him of excluding Strangers, what business has the right hon. Gentleman or anyone else to challenge him for the exercise of it? That one single Member should be allowed to overrule 650 Members of a contrary opinion, and to put upon the House this injury and degradation is to me utterly inconceivable. The right hon. Gentleman has given us no reasons except the wisdom of our ancestors, and that was exercised in reference to a state of facts entirely different from those which exist at the present moment; therefore, it seems to me most desirable that the House should, if it be possible to do so—for this is no Party question—take the matter into their own hands, and consider whether they will tolerate what, probably, will happen to-morrow, when another hon. Gentleman will again stop our proceedings. How many days will it take to convince you that you cannot go on in this way? The right hon. Gentleman is Leader of the Conservative Party, and is he prepared to go on from day to day suspending the Standing Orders without Notice? Does he not think that by so doing he is making a greater breach in the Privileges of Parliament than would be made by abrogating the rule? The rule of exclusion had a most excellent and obvious purpose when made; but change of time and circumstance has made it in the present day one of the most ridiculous and galling fetters and insults ever imposed upon a free people. The right hon. Gentleman commands many legions, and he may on the present occasion be able to overpower us; but I hope the House will consider that we are not here engaged in fighting a Party question—[“Oh, oh!”]—but that we are considering a matter in which the honour of Parliament is involved. I disclaim all Party feeling in the matter, and the right hon. Gentleman is too firmly rooted for a storm of this kind to disturb him. This power of exclusion has been used once in the present Session; it may be used again and again, and it is equally certain to be abused. I therefore ask the House to say whether it is prepared deliberately to show itself to the country as willing to maintain a rule which no other Assembly in the world ever has maintained, and to be governed by one man rather than by a majority, or whether it will awake to a little common sense on the subject, and say that the House will once for all take into its own hands the government and management of its own proceedings. I therefore hope that the House will not give way on this subject, but will exercise its own impartial and clear judgment as to whether it is desirable that these things should again and again occur and the Standing Orders should be suspended, or whether it does not think we have done enough of that kind of thing. My noble Friend does not ask the House to sacrifice any of its Privileges, but merely to forbear from abusing them, and to free itself from the trammels which can do nothing except involve us in unseemly contentions among ourselves, and lower the House of Commons in the estimation of the country.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: The right hon. Gentleman says that we should trust in the—

MR. SULLIVAN: Mr. Speaker, I espy Strangers in the Gallery behind your Chair.

MR. SPEAKER: Notice having been taken of the presence of Strangers, I have no alternative but to call upon them to withdraw.

It is believed that the following is a substantially accurate report of what took place during the Exclusion of Strangers:—

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that in consequence of the disposition of one hon. Member to interrupt the proceedings he would move the adjournment of the debate.

Moved, "That the debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy.)

MR. SULLIVAN, who spoke amid great disorder, said: I have been at nominations. I intend to show my admiration of the Prime Minister by putting the Rule in force to-night. I am a journalist, and feel on this question. I dare, though unreported, to speak for my profession—we will not submit to ignominious sufferance in that Gallery. The sun has set upon the last day of Press slavery. Either we wield a beneficial power, or the day has come when you must say Yea or Nay. I am not afraid of being called "no gentleman." I and my fellow journalists—the Members for Newcastle and Glasgow—held our peace. I am incapable of mistaking a fact. I am not speaking for out-door purposes. No reporter is here. The rule which the Prime Minister says shall not be reformed must be reformed. [Much disorder.]

MR. GOLDSMID: It would be better to abrogate the Rule quietly than to allow this disturbance to occur again. I am in favour of Lord Hartington's Resolutions; but I think the hon. Member for Louth has some reason for his conduct. The hon. Member for Galway is aggrieved because his speeches have been from time to time delivered against the feeling of the House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The hon. Member for Louth has taken an extreme course which has excited great indignation in the minds of the majority. His course is not unprecedented. [The noble Lord quoted a speech of Mr. Henley, in which he threatened to take the same course, and "to make himself a nuisance," until the House took some action in the matter.] He believed that he did afterwards, on one occasion, put his threat in execution. The grievance complained of by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. G. Hardy) is the very evil of which we complain. I do not defend the hon. Member for Louth; but there is no cause for a burst of indignation. He has done what the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) formerly proposed. I am in favour of adjournment; but I hope the Government will consider the matter, for the question must now be settled.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I beg to make a personal explanation. I was taken by surprise. I took what I thought was a proper course—"Order!"—I was going to say, had I been allowed to speak, that if the grievance rose to such a height that it was necessary to interfere the Government would interfere.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY accused the hon. Member for Louth of a breach of faith with the House; because when the noble Lord (the Marquess of Hartington) took up the question he promised not to clear the House. The hon. Member had now exercised his privilege while the House was debating the question. The hon. Member for Louth had forgotten his promise, and had been guilty of a coup d'état.

MR. SULLIVAN denied that he had pledged himself.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he was not actuated by any private feelings in the course he had taken, in consequence of his speeches not being fully reported. He had never complained of any report of his speeches except during the last Parliament. He thought that Irish feelings were denied a proper representation.

LORD ESLINGTON said, that the worst mistake a Member of Parliament could make had been made by the hon. Member for Louth, who had attempted to overawe an intelligent Assembly by a threat. The hon. Member for Louth might become a very eminent Member—he had given proofs of his capacity to become such—but he wanted discretion. The House would never submit to a threat, and would not be overawed. Hon. Members would maintain their privileges in spite of the hon. Member's threats. He suggested that the House had better now adjourn. "A wise man sleepeth upon his wrath." The House had better let twenty-four hours elapse to think over the hon. Member for Louth's threats.

MR. SULLIVAN rose to make a personal explanation, but being met by cries of "Order" and "Spoke" sat down.

MR. NEWDEGATE: The hon. Member for Louth says he is a member of the Press. He forgets that he is also a Member of this House. He uses his privilege to coerce the majority of hon. Members in obedience to the demands of the Press. This is a distinct abuse of his privilege. I shall invite the House to express its opinion on his conduct. We cannot submit to individuals attempting to coerce a majority.

MR. SULLIVAN wished to correct a statement of the hon. Member for Galway, whose narrative was taken from one of those imperfect reports of which he had complained.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY: The hon. Member told me himself.

MR. SULLIVAN: I do not recollect anything of the kind. I will state my reasons. ["Order!"] I gave Notice of my intention to enforce the Rule. I was waited upon and asked not to enforce the Rule on that night, because it would be said to be "a Jesuit conspiracy;" but when I was told that the noble Marquess would make a Motion, I said if such an assurance would be given we would not shut out the Press on the Tichborne debate; but I always reserved my right to take this course. There is no reason why the debate should not proceed.

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY thought that something must be done. He approved of the appointment of a Committee, and thought that the Rule should be suspended meanwhile.

MR. CALLAN said, that the Home Rule Party repudiated the conduct of the Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar); but the action of the hon. Member for Louth was taken without concert with that Party, which was in no way responsible for it. The hon. Member added—I was asked three years ago by Mr. Sullivan in the lobby to "espy Strangers." He said I should immortalize myself; I think the hon. Member for Louth has immortalized himself. I do not think any reporters in the Gallery have authorized Mr. Sullivan to act on their behalf.

MR. STACPOOLE thought the proposal of the hon. Member for Galway was a proper one.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, the hon. Member for Louth had exercised his right, but without judgment or discretion. There was no privilege that could not be so abused as to be a nuisance—it was so in private life. If gentlemen exercised their rights without regard to other people the world would be uninhabitable. The hon. Member for Louth had used a practical argument; but such an argument was fallacious. He (Sir George Bowyer) did not care for the historical arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London. The privilege might some day be extremely useful; but the privilege must be used with discretion. The hon. Member for Louth had exercised it for a very bad reason. He exercised it to make it a nuisance, and in order to enforce his views as to the rights of the Press. The reporters had told him they repudiated Mr. Sullivan's assistance.

MR. DODSON said, the House would derive no benefit by the continuance of this debate. He recommended the adoption of the Motion for adjournment.

MR. HORSMAN: The hon. Member for Louth, from inexperience as a young Member, has placed us in a false position. He says the feelings of the House and the Press are antagonistic, and says that, as a member of the Press, he will coerce the House to make a change. The feeling of the House is manifestly in favour of giving the Press every facility. We are dependent on the Press. Every Ministry has wished to deal with this question; but there are difficulties not apparent to the hon. Member for Louth. The whole House repudiates the ground on which the hon. Member for Louth has put the matter. He dislikes coercion in Ireland. We dislike coercion in the House of Commons.

MR. DISRAELI: I regret that the debate was interfered with. I think the House would have arrived at valuable results. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Hardy) has devoted great attention to the subject, and had opinions I did not altogether agree with. I wish he could have brought them before the House. I am not favourable to any further Committees. It is the duty of the Government to put a Motion on the Table of the House. The hon. Member for Louth has got hold of a privilege of which he thinks he can avail himself; but these privileges may be abused. There is not a privilege of the House that may not be so abused as to produce disorder, for even Motions for the adjournment of the House or a debate may be brought forward by any two Members who, proud of their privilege, might bring the House into disgrace. I thought the hon. Member had made an engagement not to disturb the debate. He may settle that with the hon. Member for Galway. I must fix a day for the resumption of this debate. I think the 25th of May will be the best day to continue it, as that is the day for which the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) has a Motion on the subject. Hon. Members will find Parliamentary Privilege a delicate thing to deal with.

MR. CHILDERS asked the Prime Minister whether he would make a distinct Motion?

MAJOR O'GORMAN: For the last week we have been under Coercion Acts. How long are we to be—morning, noon, and night—under Coercion Acts? Our observations—mine and the Prime Minister's—are unheard, and that is a great loss. I move that the Press be re-admitted.

MR. COWEN said, that the hon. Member for Louth represented the profession to which he (Mr. Cowen) belonged. The Press had no wish to come into the House against the wishes of hon. Members. The vestry-like proceedings of that Chamber were not remunerative to report. The Press would not be subjected to ignominy if they did come. He took upon himself a full share of the odium.

MR. MELDON addressed the House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON claimed the right to say something as to the day of adjournment. As an Order of the Day, it would come on too late on May 25.

MR. DISRAELI thought an united appeal to the hon. Member for Swansea would not be resisted.

MR. DILLWYN said, he would not stand in the way.

Motion for the adjournment of the debate agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Thursday.

Upon Strangers being re-admitted, it was found that the House, after transacting other Business on the Paper, had adjourned.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 14.]

(Mr. Richard Smyth, The O'Conor Don, Viscount Crichton, Mr. Dease, Mr. James Corry, Mr. William Johnston, Mr. Dickson, Mr. Redmond.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. R. SMYTH, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said: When I had an opportunity last Session of calling the attention of the House to the state of the law and of public opinion in Ireland on the subject of Sunday trading in intoxicating liquors, I was at the disadvantage of being obliged to present the argument under cover of an abstract Resolution. I am aware, as I was then, that Motions of that kind do not find much favour either with the Government of the day or with the House of Commons. But the subject is now altogether disembarrassed from an abstract Motion, and, in moving the second reading of this Bill which I now do, I ask the House to give its sanction to practical and immediate legislation. As to the provisions of the Bill, there is nothing in them that can be regarded as novel in character. It merely proposes to surround the whole of Sunday with a hedge similar to that which now encloses only a part of that day. But I do not think that anyone pleading for a measure of this kind is under any necessity whatever to prove that Sunday is not as other days. The law of England has said so already, and the provisions which exist under the present law imply that Sunday is not to be treated in regard to trading as other days of the week. Therefore, it seems to me that all argument as to the question of principle would be entirely superfluous. But if there is no new principle in this Bill, neither is there any new application of the principle, for the same restrictive law which we now ask for Ireland—or rather, I shall say, which Ireland now asks for herself—has been in operation in Scotland for more than 20 years; and I shall be very much surprised if any Scotch Member will rise in his place and say that the prohibitory Sunday law has produced any bad effects in that country. I am sure if an opportunity is given to Scotch Members to speak in this debate they will tell a very different story. This Bill cannot, I think, be considered anything but reasonable and temperate. It does not aim at hermetically sealing public-houses on Sunday, so that nobody may be able to go in or go out, but guaranteeing to lodgers and bond fide travellers all the rights and privileges possessed under the existing law, it simply proposes to put an end to the indiscriminate trading in liquors during the whole of the Sunday in Ireland. I hope it is not necessary for an advocate of this measure to disclaim any intention of attacking publicans or persons engaged in any way in the manufacture and sale of alcoholic drinks. For my part, I would consider it rather preposterous to assail people for selling as a commodity that which I have no hesitation in buying. If it is wrong to sell, it must also be wrong to buy, though I am ready to admit that there may be, from the temperance advocate's point of view, a distinction between the act of the tempter and the act of the tempted; but I do not go into that, or travel beyond the record of this Bill, which has nothing in the world to do with the general question of trading in liquors. If it were necessary, a good deal could be said for publicans. They are the licentiates of the State; and, to the credit of the licensing authorities in Ireland, I am bound to say that it is now almost as difficult for a man to get an appointment to exercise his gifts as a publican as it is to get appointed to be a schoolmaster or a dispensary doctor. Their character stands above all possibility of impeachment, and that is all that may be said about it. But publicans are traders, and so far as they are so, the presumption is that they ought to confine themselves, like other traders, to the ordinary days of the week; and I submit that the burden of proof lies upon those who claim the right to extract profits out of Sunday trading. There can be here no question of vested interests, for no man is acknowledged to have a trading interest in the Lord's Day, and it would be idle for anyone to plead that he has a vested interest in the weaknesses and drinking habits of the working classes. I put aside, then, all trading pleas and remonstrances on the part of licensed victuallers, and the only arguments I feel myself bound to consider are those drawn from public convenience and public opinion. It is on that ground, and that ground alone, that the issue is to be joined here, though an appeal might be made to higher sanctions which could hardly fail to meet with respect and sympathy in this Assembly. Now, speaking of trade, I must request the attention of the House to a remarkable and most significant circumstance connected with the movement for Sunday closing in Ireland. The only opponents—and this is not a rhetorical exaggeration, but substantially a literal fact—the only opponents of this Bill are a portion of the Irish and nearly all the English publicans. How does it come that they take such an interest in the question? I can only account for their action on the supposition that it is with them a question of traffic. They do not want their Sunday profits to be interfered with, for, notwithstanding the acknowledgment I have already made that they are excellent people, still I do not believe that their presence at public meetings, convened by other people and in other interests, or that their presence in the Lobbies of this House for the purpose of persuading Members, and even Ministers of the Crown, to vote against this Bill, is to be accounted for upon the grounds of pure public spirit, or that they are the exclusive champions of Irish liberty, and the only disinterested guardians of public convenience and morality. At all events, as they are open to the suspicion of self-interest—a taint from which the general public of Ireland, who support this measure with an earnestness rarely seen, are altogether free—we must seek a more impartial judgment on the question than any we can get from the mixed tribunal of English and Irish publicans. What do the employers of labour in Ireland say on the subject? I never conversed with an employer of labour, yet who did not tell me that Monday was the day of all days in the week when his works were beset with the greatest troubles and dislocations, arising from the absence of some of his men, and the perfect uselessness of others on account of the drinking of the previous Sunday evening. Only a few days ago a deputation was courteously received by the Prime Minister on this subject. During that interview the Mayor of Belfast—and who in the Three Kingdoms could speak with greater authority than the Mayor of Belfast?—stated that sometimes works had to be suspended on Monday, and often on a part of Tuesday, because of the effects of Sunday evening drinking. Sunday's rest was intended by all law, Divine and human, to recruit the exhausted energies of the working classes; but instead of that a temptation is placed in their way, during their hours of rest from labour to wear out the remnants of their strength by dissipation; and if they go back to their work on Monday mornings, it is in a condition of physical and mental enfeeblement which makes it almost a cruelty to ask them to do anything at all. It is all very well to have fine theories about the public-house being the working men's club; but all I can say is that if gentlemen used their clubs in the same way as that to which the public-house is unhappily devoted by the poor who have not learned the virtue of self-control, I should hope to find some courageous Member introducing into this House a Sunday Closing Bill for the clubs of St. James's and Pall Mall. This is an Assembly of practical men, who are not hunting after subtle analogies, and they know that there is not one feature of substantial similarity between the public-houses in Donnybrook and the St. Stephen's Club across the way. But I find that some English Members are misled by honest and honourable misconceptions as to Irish habits and customs. They have a notion that we are proposing to give Irishmen and women stale beer for their Sunday dinner, and they wonder how we can be so cruel as to treat our countrymen and countrywomen in that way. Now, I must distinctly and emphatically point out that draught beer is not used by the poor in Ireland. An Irish labourer, such is his perversity, thinks beer very little better than muddy water, and he would not thank you if you were to turn Lough Corrib into beer. He would certainly be angry if you turned the Devil's Punchbowl into beer; whereas I am credibly informed that many English labourers are of opinion that human life would lose a great deal of its interest without beer. It is not hard to teach an Englishman to drink whisky, but it is next to an impossibility to teach an Irishman to drink beer. So I hope we shall hear no more about the Sunday beer argument; for Sunday beer at a working man's dinner in Ireland is as great a myth as the Irish Banshee. Now, adverted to the present state of the law, I am puzzled to know why a public-house is to be opened at 2 o'clock on Sunday afternoon and not at 11 or 12 o'clock. It cannot be because people are more likely to go to excess at noon than in the afternoon. The motive for shutting up public-houses during canonical hours is, I suppose a device, but it is a very shallow device for protecting the Churches. Well, in my opinion, you may just as well let public-houses compete with the churches as compete with the homes. I have but little veneration for a religious sentiment which protects the clergyman from the competition of the publican, and will give no protection to the poor man's wife. The clergy of all denominations have repudiated this distinction, and have told you in their memorials that they do not want the continuance of this law, the theory of which is that their churches and chapels are to be filled in the morning and the whisky shops in the afternoon. They are willing and anxious that the families of the poor should be cared for by British law; and I think they never uttered a sentiment more in harmony with the religion they have to guard than when they tell the House of Commons that in their view the hearth in its own place is just as sacred as the altar. I have heard it urged—indeed, I am not sure but that it was said in the debates of last year—that if drink was bought on Saturday night for Sunday use the children of the family will be led into temptation, and that it is far better for the head of the house to adjourn to a tavern and drink where his children cannot see him. I never said anything so damaging to drink as that, and I doubt whether the publicans will thank their friends for giving such a repulsive picture of the article they have to sell. But let us see how this will apply to another argument of our opponents. They say that the working classes take a walk or go some little trip on a Sunday afternoon, and it would be hard if they could not get a glass of whisky on the way. Well, suppose their excursion extends over three miles from home. In that case they become bond fide travellers by statute law, and can get as much drink as they like, even under this Bill. Again, suppose they merely take a walk near their own homes, surely, in that case, they will take their wives and children with them. Irishmen, at all events, are not such anchorites as to go out for a walk without gentler company if they can get it. When they come to the public-house they must either take their wives and children into the bar with them or else leave them standing outside—no Irishman will ever do this latter. They will inevitably be taken inside and initiated into the carousals of the Sunday tavern. That is what it comes to, and I put it to hon. Members to consider whether a working man going out with his wife and children on Sunday afternoon—if it is right that they should so go out—would not make them and himself happier if they all returned home together to their humble tea-table, instead of his taking them along with him to drink whisky with some chance boon companions? You tell us that you cannot make men sober by Act of Parliament. I know you cannot. Can you make men healthy by Act of Parliament? Can you abolish fever or consumption by Act of Parliament? Yet you are, Session after Session, doing your best to remove the pollutions which generate these fatal maladies; and you are even now proposing to dam up or divert in some way the wash of factories, that it may no longer pollute your rivers. We do not ask you to treat drunkards otherwise than you deal with fever or consumption. It is not to be expected that an Act of Parliament will ever contain a clause to this effect—"From and after the 1st day of January typhus fever shall hereby cease and determine;" and yet we do expect that under wise legislation the causes which produce it may be diminished. So, as to drunkenness, you will never abolish it by Act of Parliament; but you may mitigate its severity and contract its area by taking all reasonable and prudent means to keep those who are most susceptible of it away as far as possible from the dangerous contagion. Parliament has hitherto treated drunkenness only as a crime. I am far from denying that there is a moral element involved in it; but I believe drunkenness to be as much a disease as a crime. I never see a drunken man dragged away by the police as a vile criminal that my nature does not revolt against the legal violence as perhaps an irrelevant and mistaken punishment. The man is diseased, and it is for Parliament to consider whether it has as yet done everything in its power to abridge the mischiefs that propagate this dreadful disorder. We are met with a plausible allegation that entire Sunday closing will magnify the evils of the shebeen system in Ireland. I admit the ingenuity of my countrymen in these matters. Hon. Members who have visited the Giant's Causeway will remember the benevolent old man at the Giant's Well, who presents the tourist with a glass of ice-cold water and some Bushmills whisky to take the cold off it. It is a present, but the old man is good-natured enough to accept a present in return. That is an Ulster shebeen. Hon. Members who have been to Killarney will also recollect the black-eyed Kerry girl at Mangerton, on the Gap of Dunloe, who sold them a glass of goat's milk for 1s. and gave them a glass of whisky for nothing. That is the shebeen system in Munster; and I venture to think that it does not lie very heavy on the conscience of any English Member that he was thus far implicated in the shebeen system when he was over in Ireland. But the hon. Member for Dundalk has moved for Returns from Dublin, and I know very well what he wants to infer from these Returns when he gets them. He finds the arrests for drunkenness are largely made during the prohibited hours in that city, and he wants the House to infer that this drunkenness has been produced by drinking in shebeens during these prohibited hours. That is the only argument I can imagine he intends to adduce from these figures, and yet I hesitate to think that he would attempt such a draft upon the credulity of this House. What is the fact? These drunken men and women got the drink during the open hours. When open hours are ended they are turned out into the streets, and, of course, the arrests are made during the prohibited hours. The arrests are not made in the houses, but in the streets, and it is inevitable that arrests will take place at a time when the poor victims will have no longer the shelter of a public-house. To insinuate that the arrests made during the prohibited hours are due to drinking in shebeens is not supported by one particle of proof, and it is an inference wholly unwarrantable. If the shebeen-keepers get men inside and make them drunk, they will not turn them out at all until they are sober; and, in point of fact, there is scarcely an instance of an arrest being traceable to drinking in an unlicensed house; and, even if it were so, which it is not, it is altogether a matter of police. Predictions exactly similar to those about shebeens were made about illicit distillation when the high duty was put upon Irish whisky, yet it is well known that poteen, or small-still whisky does not exist in one-tenth the quantities that was the case 30 years ago. Give the Constabulary an adequate inducement to bring offenders to justice, and shebeens will soon be swept out of existence, as small stills have been driven out of the mountains of Tyrone and Donegal. I have not up to this time troubled the House with statistics; for I feel that in any argument drawn from them there is often the fallacy of post hoc ergo propter hoc. An elector of Stoke is reported in the newspapers to have said, some days ago, that he regretted having voted for the hon. Member for that borough, because, since that election, meat had gone up a halfpenny a pound. That elector, doubtless, was proving his case from statistics, and he probably belongs to the Statistical Society. Statistics are very much like loaded dice: you can make them fall as you wish, and turn up the side that suits you best. Now, I shall not go into the question of the comparative drunkenness of England, Scotland, and Ireland, nor shall I rely on the fact, although it is a fact, that Scotchmen drink less per head than they did before the Forbes-Mackenzie Act came into operation in that country. I think that when Scotch working men are well off, and get the chance, they will drink as much as their neighbours. What I am now concerned with is Sunday drinking, and I fearlessly assert that, so far as public evidence goes, this has diminished in Scotland under the Sunday closing law. There is just one significant comparison to which I should like to draw attention. In England and Ireland where the prohibitory Sunday law is not in operation the arrests for drunkenness on Sunday are about the average of other days of the week, whereas in Scotland they are far below the average. I shall trouble the House with Returns from one city in each of these countries. In Dublin, for three months ending December 30, 1874, there were 602 Sunday arrests, the average for other days being 634. In Manchester the Sunday arrests for the year ending September 29, 1874, were 1,384, the average for the other days of the week being 1,408. Now, let us take the case of Glasgow. Baillie Collins, in a paper read at the Social Science Congress in September last, said with respect to Glasgow—

“I had the curiosity to examine for myself the records of the Central Police Office for the last month. I sat on the bench of that Court and found that of 925 prisoners taken for that single offence, for being drunk and incapable, in that month, only 30 prisoners were brought in on the whole of the five Sundays of that month—an average of six for each Sunday.”

It will be observed that the average for other days of the week was 36. That is to say, while in Dublin and Manchester, where the public-houses are open during a part of Sunday, the arrests for drunkenness are about the average of other days; in Glasgow, where there are no public-houses open, the arrests are only one-sixth of those on other days, and probably these are bonâ fide travellers. But, apart from these figures, which are as conclusive as figures can be, the clenching argument as regards Scotland is just this—that the Scotch want to retain the present system, and would rise in constitutional revolt against any attempt to undo the Act of 1853. From this point the transition is easy to my last argument—the state of public opinion in Ireland. I believe there never was a measure on which the opinion of Ireland in every corner, every Province, every class, and every creed was more clearly pronounced than upon this. I do not rely on any one set of evidences, which I know might be misleading, but I rely upon an induction of evidence absolutely demonstrative and overwhelming. I begin with a Memorial addressed to the Prime Minister, and signed by the following persons in their individual capacity:—Magistrates, 1,413; Episcopalian clergy, 1,119; Roman Catholic priests, principally parish priests, 864; Presbyterian ministers, 342; Wesleyan ministers, 73; Primitive Methodist ministers, 34; ministers of other denominations, 52; physicians and surgeons, 744; Poor Law Guardians, 1,991; town councillors, 596; employers of labour, 453. I should mention that the signatures to this Memorial were obtained by sending circulars through the Post Office; and we all know that the number of persons who will take the trouble of replying to a printed circular is small in comparison with those who would sign if personally appealed to. From this point of view, the Memorial in question is one of the most significant ever presented to a Minister of State. In addition to this, there have been presented to this House more than 1,000 Petitions, signed by over 200,000 persons of all classes, principally the middle and lower classes. Of these, 88 Petitions have come from Boards of Guardians largely representing rural populations; 46 from town councils, including urban communities like Dublin and Limerick; and the remainder from parishes, congregations, towns, villages, districts, societies, professions, and public meetings in every part of Ireland. This thing has not been done in a corner. The movement in favour of this measure has been open, above-board, and widespread; and no one can justly say that those who are opposed to it have not taken alarm at its promise of success. That portion of the Irish publicans who are opposed to it believe in its early success, and if they could rouse public opinion on their side, they would gladly and eagerly do so. But the truth is there is no public opinion to arouse on their side. They have shown themselves here and there at public meetings to move amendments, which were out-voted by overwhelming majorities; but they have convened no meetings of their own, and for the simple reason that the numbers who would attend them would be so small that it would render their opposition ridiculous. The fact is that Ireland is against them. Very likely we shall be told that the Irish Members are not united among themselves. I should like to know how much union is expected among Irish Members? Does England never succeed in obtaining anything in the shape of legislation until the English Members are united with regard to it? There were last year as many as four to one of the Irish Members who were in favour of this measure, and I shall wait patiently to hear on what occasions in all history since England became a free country there were in the proportion of four English Members to one in favour of any measure, and England did not get it? There is no such case. No one can be more sensible than I am of the expediency of classifying the Members of this House according to their nationality, but we cannot abolish facts by avoiding allusion to them. Shut our eyes to it as we please, there are English ideas, Scotch ideas, and Irish ideas represented in the House of Commons; and I think they are not the friends of either country who insist on a rigid uniformity in the laws by which they are governed. Now, in Ireland every class, rich and poor, high and low, want this Bill to become law, if ever they wanted anything; and surely a more innocuous idea never took possession of the mind of any people than that of suspending the custom of drinking in public-houses on the Lord's Day. I am far from calling in question the right of English Members to pronounce judgment on this Irish question, and to pronounce it adversely to our wishes. You say we ask some things that would be hurtful to England. But is that any reason for refusing us something that cannot by any possibility affect the social condition of the English people, or the political relations of the two countries? Scotland got this boon when Scotland asked for it. We admit your right to refuse it to Ireland, but there is a political prudence that ought to be allowed to take its place alongside Parliamentary rights. You have a right, which I do not question, to overwhelm the Irish Members in the vote to be given to-day. But when you have scored another victory over this peculiar idea of our country there will be a Parliamentary equity to identify itself with the cause of Ireland, and to proclaim that it too has been defeated in the unequal contest with English power. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

THE O'CONOR DON seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Richard Smyth.)

MR. CALLAN, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, he wished to state, in the most explicit manner, that he did so neither as the advocate, accredited or otherwise, of the licensed vintners, nor yet because he was in favour of the unrestricted sale of liquors on Sunday in Ireland. He was neither directly or indirectly connected with the trade, nor had any of his family the most remote interest either as a producer or vendor. He opposed the Bill, as he had ever done, on principle, because he disliked, utterly detested, all such compulsory prohibitive legislation, and because, also, he believed that the passing of such a Bill would lead to the creation of evils of much greater magnitude, in the shape of "shebeens" and irregular houses, than the promoters of the Bill professed it was intended to remedy. He trusted that the House would summarily reject the Bill, and by a decisive majority show the country that they did not approve of the persistent introduction of discussions of this nature, which could not have any practical or beneficial effect. He considered that a brief retrospect of the history of legislation with reference to the liquor traffic would conduce to the understanding by the House of the bearings of the Bill before them. In the Session of 1868 a Bill for regulating "The sale of fermented and distilled liquors by retail on Sundays in Ireland" was brought in by the hon. and gallant Member for Longford County (Major O'Reilly), Lord Cremorne, and Mr. Pim, the then senior Member for the City of Dublin. This Bill extended the prohibition of the sale of liquors to be consumed on the premises to the entire of Sunday, but permitted their sale for consumption off the premises from 2 o'clock to 4 o'clock P.M., and from 8 to 9 o'clock P.M., and by eating-house keepers to their customers at meals. That Bill, after considerable discussion, was referred to a Select Committee of 15 Members, of whom one was an English, one a Scotch Member, and the remaining 13 Irish Members, of whom four were still Members of the House—namely, the hon. Members for Antrim (Mr. O'Neill), Ennis (Captain Stacpoole), Cork City (Mr. Murphy), and Longford (Major O'Reilly). The Committee sat 13 days, extending over a period of two months. They examined 22 witnesses, representing almost every class and district in Ireland, and, the Irish Press not having the fear of breach of Privilege before their eyes, fully reported the evidence. The Committee, in preparing their Report, proceeded by Resolution; and they first resolved, on the Motion of the Chairman, the hon. and gallant Member for Longford, that—

"The hours for the sale of intoxicating drinks on Sunday and the other days enumerated in the Bill be from 2 p.m. to 7 p.m., except in the towns to be hereafter defined."

They next resolved that in other towns, to be afterwards defined, the hours should be from 2 P.M. to 9 P.M. These Resolutions were passed unanimously, and the Report of the Committee and recommendations appeared in the shape of the Bill "as amended by the Select Committee." In consequence of the lateness of the Session, the Bill was not persevered with, but was re-introduced in the Session of 1869, and withdrawn after discussion, on the representation of the then Chief Secretary for Ireland, that the subject would be dealt with by the Government Bill when introduced. That promise was fulfilled, and in the Licensing Bill of 1872 the hours for closing on Sundays recommended by the amended Bill of the Select Committee of 1868 were adopted. He asked what case had been made out to justify interference with the existing Act, which had been found to work satisfactorily, or what evidence had been brought forward to displace that given before the Select Committee of 1868? The hon. Member for Londonderry County (Mr. R. Smyth) had referred to the Memorial to the Prime Minister; but he (Mr. Callan) would ask how many of the 7,681 gentlemen who signed it were persons who were likely to use public-houses? Opinions of private individuals could be had as plentiful as blackberries; but the hon. Member for Londonderry County had failed to produce one single report or statement in support of his views, from one single magistrate or police officer responsible for the carrying out of the Act, and the accuracy of which could be tested. On referring to the evidence taken before the Select Committee of 1868, he (Mr. Callan) found that all those who had the largest experience of the working of the Acts regulating the liquor traffic were opposed to the total closing of public-houses on Sundays. Mr. John Lewis O'Ferrall, the Chief Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, Dublin, speaking from large experience, said that—

"Total closing on Sundays would not be desirable. There was too much reason to fear that the evil of Sunday traffic, instead of being lessened thereby, would be aggravated."

Mr. Inspector—now Superintendent—

Carr, one of the ablest as he was one of the most experienced of the force in Ireland, said—

“There is less drunkenness on Sundays in Dublin than on any other day in the week;” and that “the closing of public-houses on Sundays would, in his opinion, operate injuriously;”

but he (Mr. Callan) referred with even still greater confidence to the evidence of the very rev. Monsignor M'Cabe, one of the vicars-general of the diocese of Dublin, who stated that “drunkenness was on the decrease,” and who, whilst most anxious for temperance, “could not recommend total closing” on Sundays, and considered—

“That it would be a hardship to deprive the working classes of all means of getting reasonable refreshments on Sundays.”

Mr. Hamilton, the resident magistrate at Cork, “would not advise the total closing of public-houses on Sundays,” and considered that so doing “would be unfair to the working classes.” Whilst Mr. John Charles O'Donnell, the resident magistrate in Belfast, perhaps the ablest and most experienced of his class in Ireland—certainly a far better authority than the Mayor of that town—“Did not think that public-houses should be altogether closed.” Mr. Ryan, R.M., County Wexford—

“Had no doubt that a very large class of people would feel very keenly that Sunday closing was class legislation.”

The Mayor of Cork also told the Committee that “it would be impossible to stop the sale of spirituous liquors on Sunday in that city,” and further said “that if it were done it would only lead to a worse state of affairs, by the creation of she-been houses to a very large extent.” He (Mr. Callan) would not further refer to the evidence taken before the Select Committee. No attempt had been made to displace it, and he would therefore content himself by stating that he had been informed by both Mr. O'Donnell, of Belfast, and Mr. Superintendent Carr that their opinions, as disclosed in their evidence, had been strengthened since 1868. Reference had been made to a meeting of the Dublin Corporation, where a Petition in favour of the Bill had been adopted. He knew some of the members of that body who had not taken part in the discussion, but who were strongly opposed to the Bill before the House. He would only refer to one, an Alderman—he believed the senior Alderman—who generally acted as locum tenens for the Lord Mayor, and who had himself declined that office—namely, Mr. Alderman Redmond, who had written him (Mr. Callan)—

“I am and have been connected with the spirit trade in Dublin for upwards of 40 years. I have at present two rather extensive establishments, one in the city and one in Kingstown, in neither of which is there any business transacted on Sundays, and although it would be to my individual advantage that all licensed houses were compelled to close on Sundays as I now do, yet from long experience and a thorough knowledge of the city I have no hesitation in saying that it is my opinion that the evil in a large city like Dublin of closing licensed houses on Sunday would soon be found to be much greater than to allow them to be opened for a reasonable time. This is not the age for class legislation, and a reasonable time should be allowed on Sundays for the working classes to provide themselves with refreshments, which is allowed to the wealthier classes without restriction at their clubs and hotels. These are my opinions hurriedly written, but they may be taken, at all events, as honest and truthful, according to my belief, as my personal interests would be very materially served by having every licensed house closed, as my own are at present, on Sundays.”

Reference had been made by the hon. Member for Londonderry County to the number of public meetings in favour of the Bill held throughout the country; but these meetings had not been called by local parties. They were called through the organization of a Dublin association supplied with ample funds by the general organization existing in this country, and the active agents of that association supplied the orators for the occasion. One of these meetings had been called in the town which he had the honour to represent, and which he regretted unavoidable circumstances had prevented him from presiding over. However, he was glad to take that opportunity to present the Petition adopted by that meeting and signed by the Chairman, Mr. James Norton, who was also, he believed, the President of the local Total Abstinence Society, comprising some 800 or 1,200 of the artisans and labourers of Dundalk, almost all of whom he was proud to number amongst his staunchest friends. He was glad of this opportunity of expressing the deep obligation he was under to the members of that body, who had nobly acted as his body-guard at the last Election. Every one of those electors was thoroughly aware before the time for that Election of his sentiments on the question; but they had returned him notwithstanding, unpledged with reference to it, and he did not think any of them would change because of the vote he should feel it his duty to give upon it. Reference had been made to the opinions of the Mayor of Belfast. He had not the pleasure of the acquaintance of that remarkable gentleman, who, when before the Committee of 1868, stated that he "did not regard spirits as any refreshment;" and whose latest appearance was before the Premier the other day, when he threw dirt on his compatriots, and stated—

"That a great deal of the drunkenness which exists in Liverpool, Glasgow, and other large towns on this side of the Channel, is largely occasioned by Irish citizens coming over and bringing their whisky-drinking customs with them."

The Mayor of Belfast presided over a most remarkable meeting held in that city in the month of February in favour of the objects of this Bill. He would wish to direct the attention of the House to the nature of the statements made thereat, in order to enable them to judge of the somewhat fanatical nature of the movement. The Mayor of Belfast in his opening statement laid down the proposition that "the opening of public-houses on Sunday and the selling of whisky on Sunday was a gross breach of the fourth Commandment" and that they might as well violate a Commandment that forbade murder, adultery, or theft as violate a Commandment that forbade the sale of these articles on Sunday. And following after that extraordinary harangue came a reverend Professor, who denounced public-houses as "dens of infamy." The Mayor of Belfast permitted this language to pass with impunity, but he crowned the day's performance by, to those who knew the North of Ireland, a still more extraordinary performance: he silenced John Rea! After all that, which would have contented any ordinary man, he found the selfsame Mayor taking part in another meeting in favour of the Permissive Bill and Sunday closing, in the last month. The Mayor again presided, and outdid himself. He said that—

"The cardinal sin of the Jewish nation was idolatry, and that what idolatry was to the Jewish nation the liquor traffic was to this country. It was a sad reflection that the English-speaking people were found to be the most drunken race on the face of the globe. While they had to lament a sad state of things among the well-paid artizan classes, on the other hand, there had been an immense improvement in public sentiment. Those who could remember the festivities of 30 or 40 years ago would recollect that a host would not have done his duty to his guests, if he had not sent them all home drunk. In this respect there had been an improvement, and thanks to the influence of temperance societies that disgrace was largely removed. He had the honour, as an example, some two months ago to be invited to a dinner at Dublin Castle. The host and hostess were the Lord Lieutenant and the Duchess of Abercorn, and there were about 100 guests. He was glad to find that at the close of one of the most splendid dinners he ever sat down to, when the guests returned to the drawing-room, there was not a symptom of the slightest intemperance observable."

And this announcement, gravely made by one of his Excellency's guests, was received by the crowded meeting of Permissive Billites and Sunday closers with loud cheering as an incontestable proof of the influence in high quarters of the temperance societies. Such was a fair sample of the stuff talked by leaders of the movement in the North of Ireland. Comment was unnecessary. But taking up the report of another branch of the same body under a different name, "The Irish Temperance League," they would find it stated that—

"It becomes more and more evident that, if the Church is to be considered as faithful to her great trust and mission on earth, her relation to the total abstinence and prohibitory movement must be that of steadfast, unfaltering, whole-hearted friendship. It is only when her ministry and her membership are purged from all complicity with the iniquitous, God-dishonouring traffic, either as vendors, consumers, or purchasers, that she can hope in confidence to see truth triumph, and the mightiest citadel in Satan's dominions razed to its very foundations."

Such was the language used, not after dinner, but in a deliberate and, no doubt, well-considered report—language not referring exclusively to any church in particular, but embracing all churches, and denouncing as God-dishonouring almost every Member of the House, save the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) and his chosen few. The organ of the Sunday Closing Movement, The Alliance News, drew attention to the Refreshment Bar of the House. It said that an excellent example had just been set in the Assembly of the Dominion of Canada by the shutting-up of the refreshment counter

there; and referring to this House went on to say that—

“Many speeches have been more or less spoiled, and many a vote given or lost through the influence of what is called a ‘heated imagination’—that is, an after-dinner speech,”— and further on declared that the destinies of our Empire may some day be affected very seriously “by the consumption of liquor on the premises.” He merely referred to that in proof of the absurdity of the movement and the intermeddling propensity of its promoters. But, not content with all this, they had engaged Moody and Sankey, and in The Irish Temperance Banner, edited by the Secretary of the Irish Permissive Bill Association, Moody and Sankey were “trotted out,” asserting that no whisky seller could be a Christian, and that they would soon make their church “too hot” for such a sinner. He (Mr. Callan) had attended one meeting of the Sunday Closing Movement in Dublin as a spectator—in the round room of the Rotunda, which was scarcely half filled. A Jesuit talker, the Rev. Robert Kelly, whose reception by the audience far exceeded in enthusiasm that accorded to any previous speaker, was handed a “cut and dry” resolution to support; but the rev. gentleman, while strongly advocating temperance, &c., expressly guarded himself by stating that common sense obliged him to declare that all the good possible would be obtained by reasonable restriction of hours, and not by entire closing. This statement was well received by the meeting, but the rev. gentleman was soon “set upon” by the paid secretary, who demanded the whole hog or none. One result of Sunday closing would be an agitation for Saturday closing, and he had heard the Dean of the Chapel Royal declare that he would not be satisfied till the public-houses were closed from 12 o’clock on one Saturday till 12 o’clock on the next Saturday night. The Times, in a leading article on the subject, said recently—

“That between 60 and 70 of the Irish Members pledged themselves at the General Election to vote for the Sunday Closing Bill.”

He denied that such was the case. He had examined the files of The Irish Times and Freeman’s Journal, and could not find in the address of any of the candidates for Irish seats the slightest reference to the Sunday Closing question. Indeed, even the other day, on reading over the electioneering address of the hon. Gentleman the new Member for Kilkenny, the Chairman of the Executive of the United Kingdom Alliance, he failed to discover the slightest reference to what they call “the burning question of the day.” Surely, if the question was deemed so important, while Home Rule, Denominational Education, Amnesty, Amendment of the Land Laws, &c., were referred to, Sunday Closing would not have been treated with such silent contempt. In the same article it was also stated that—

“The adhesion of the Home Rule Members almost in a body to the Sunday closing movement is a proof that the measure is not likely to offend the masses who are most directly concerned, and whose convenience would be trencched upon. The Irish farmers and peasantry, and the tradespeople of the towns cannot be hostile to Sunday closing when the candidates who are seeking their votes openly declare for it.”

He believed that he knew who were Home Rule Members, and, with the Division List in his hand, he could confidently state, without fear of contradiction, that in the division of last year the numbers of Home Rule Members were 10 for and 6 against. He would next refer to the attempts at intimidation of hon. Members to compel them to vote for the Bill, and would state that he himself had been threatened with a contest in case he persevered with his opposition to the Bill, one of the paid officers of the Alliance having stated that if he did not withdraw the Notice which he had placed on the Table of the House that he would be opposed whenever an election took place for Dundalk. Well, he treated such threats with contempt, and would like to see the party in question or any other carpet-bag interloper attempt to interfere between him and his constituents. He had received an electoral memorial from Dundalk calling on him to vote for the Bill; and with reference to it would observe that immediately before the last General Election he had circulated his speech against the Bill made in July of 1873 amongst his constituents, and that from the beginning to the end of his canvass, as he had before stated, no objection had been made nor any question asked of him, and that therefore he could not with any self-respect change the vote he would give. He said that the memorial had been signed by a large number of his constituents. [Mr. R. SMYTH: By how many?] By upwards of 260, of whom the greater number, he was confident, had voted for him before, and he felt equally confident would vote for him again. However, he was not a delegate; he was a Representative, and as such would exercise his own judgment. He would not be coerced or intimidated into any course, save that which his conscience dictated to him. Reference had been made to the number of signatures to Petitions, and the parties signing were classified and enumerated; but only one Petition had been presented from artizans, and the hon. Member carefully abstained from stating how many signatures of artizans were attached thereto. He would not trouble the House with statistics, save in one instance. Notwithstanding the operation of the Forbes-Mackenzie Act in Scotland, and perhaps in consequence of it, the consumption of spirits in Scotland in 1874, with a population of some 2,000,000 less, exceeded that of Ireland by 800,000 gallons. In conclusion, he would challenge the hon. Member about to follow him (the O'Connor Don) to show that that Sunday Movement had any spontaneity in Ireland. The organization in Dublin "got up" Petition meetings, &c., not one of which was the spontaneous outcome of the people, and from personal experience he could say that, judging from the City of Dublin, a strong feeling existed among the working classes against the measure. He thanked the House for the attention with which they had heard him, and again stating that he had no personal interest one way or the other, that he was only influenced by a deep sense of duty, hoped the House would, by a decisive majority, put an end to this annual Motion. He was in favour of the shortening of the hours of remaining open on Saturday nights and on Sunday; but he opposed the present measure in the interests of the poorer classes of the Irish people. He begged to move the rejection of the Bill.

MAJOR O'GORMAN, in seconding the Amendment, said: Sir, I opposed this Bill in the last Session of Parliament, and I shall oppose it this day, and for the same reasons, or some of them, as I alleged when I last spoke on this very important subject. I repeat that the passing of a Bill of this description would be a perpetuation of that which is most hateful to Ireland—the making of one law for the rich and of another for the poor. A grave mistake was made by the Legislature when it declared a club to be similar to a private house. It is not so: there is no well-regulated club whose rules do not call on each member to pay his bill daily before he quits the precincts. This is not the case in a private house; but people who belong to clubs have a right to go to their clubs on Sunday, and drink whatever they please. People who live at hotels have the same privilege; yet these are among the people who come forward here and try to prevent poor people having anything on Sunday. Public-houses are for the accommodation of the poor, but clubs and hotels are for the accommodation of the rich. Now I will ask this question of hon. Members, with hearts in their bodies—and I asked it last Session. Suppose an artizan should take his sweet wife and children for a walk to Sandymount, near Dublin, on a warm Sunday. After a time he wants to return to Dublin. He is passed on his way by a gentleman driving a phaeton with a pair of high-stepping horses. When the poor man gets into Dublin he finds himself very thirsty after his walk. His wife and children are also very thirsty. As he trudges on and on, he passes a club-house, in the window of which he sees the rich man, who had shortly before driven past him on the road, drinking a glass of sherry, or possibly of dry champagne, while actually this poor man cannot get a glass of water until he has reached home. Sir, I say, there is no Irishman of spirit who would submit to such a mockery; you make slaves of a population if you treat them in that sort of way. But there is a stronger reason against this Bill. If you close public-houses on Sundays in Ireland you will clearly establish illegal sale of spirits, and most likely its illegal distillation. The consequence will be, that the police will be perpetually employed in the detection of that which was not crime before. The Petty Sessions Courts will be crowded every week or every fortnight with defendants losing their valuable time, and the whole land will swarm with Corydons and Talbots, who will first induce the people to violate the law, and then inform against them, to the great delight of the back stairs of Dublin Castle. I think that that consideration alone ought to put an end to this Bill this day. But I can give you reasons stronger. I look upon this Bill as a puling miserable thing, a particular thing; nothing universal about it. Nothing holic—I dare not, I suppose, say Catholic—about it; an emasculated mile and a-half sort of thing. If we had a statesman who would do the right thing because it was right—if we had a statesman who would do the virtuous thing because it was virtuous, and not because it might affect prejudicially the pocket of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; if we had an old Irish Brehon sage here, how would he proceed? He would approach the question somewhat in this fashion. He would say—“This whisky is the destruction of my people.” [Ironical cheers.] I am glad to hear those cheers. “This spirit is the destruction of my people. It ruins their health. It deprives them of their reason. It lowers them in the scale of creation even lower than brutes in the field. It is manufactured of that which should provide food, not poison for my people. Let it end. Sunday and Monday alike. Let it never appear in our sacred island again. Go, my officers, to the bonding warehouses, drag out the puncheons, the pipes, and the hogsheads of this poison; swill the streets of my cities with it; and as the very dogs lap it up and fall prostrate under its influence, let Irishmen learn what a foreign nation has provided for their destruction.” [Ironical cheers.] Wait a moment. In order that the interest of a so-called National Debt, not one shilling, not one doit, not one farthing of which was ever incurred by Ireland, shall be paid. Here would be law-giving; here would be impossible drinking Sunday or Monday; here would be wisdom; here no class legislation could show its detested face; here would be Lycurgan severity, but Lycurgan severity, Sir, chained to Lycurgan justice. Here all would stand equal in the presence of respected not despised laws. But this miserable Bill deals with only one-seventh of the week. I do not believe in legal dram-drinking for six days of the week, and legal “hedging” of it for the seventh. It is a miserable Bill, as I said before. I, too, have received threats from people who, I suppose, call themselves constituents of mine, and who tell me I shall be thrown out at the next Election if I do not support this Bill. I say—“Very well; be it so.” The Athenians ostracised Aristides. They got tired of hearing him called “the Just.” I shall not venture to compare myself to one of the greatest men of antiquity; but all I can say is that if my constituents ostracise me, I hope it will be [for the same reason. I hope the House will, by a large majority, express its utter disapproval of this Bill, and I very heartily second the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day six months.”—(Mr. Callan.)

Question proposed, “That the word ‘now’ stand part of the Question.”

THE O’CONOR DON: Sir, the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) has alluded so pointedly to me in the course of his speech that the House will not be surprised at my desiring to say a few words by way of reply. He asked me—and I have no doubt that the House will expect an answer—whether the movement for the closing of public-houses on Sundays in Ireland was a spontaneous movement, or whether it did not owe its existence and the progress which it had made in the country to the exertions made by the Central Association in Dublin, which, he indicated, was affiliated with the associations in England? Before answering this question, I would first ask him, what does he mean by “a spontaneous movement;” how does he define “spontaneous?” In all political or social movements there generally is some central association, by means of which the principles of the movement are made known throughout the country. I believe that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dundalk is a member of what is known in Ireland as the Home Rule movement, and I would ask him if that is “a spontaneous movement?” I have no doubt that he will say that it is; but yet there is a central association in connection with it in Dublin. There are various Home Rule associations throughout the country, and through the agency of those associations public opinion has been formed, and has expressed itself on the subject of Home Rule. But will the hon. Member for Dundalk say that the Home Rule Movement is not a "spontaneous movement" in Ireland? In the same way the Sunday Closing Movement in Ireland has its central association in Dublin, and through this association the opinion of the Irish people has been ascertained, and it may be, to a certain extent, formed. I say, therefore, that this movement is a spontaneous one, and that such machinery is necessary for the public to give form and expression to their spontaneous desires. I heard with regret the hon. Member for Dundalk, and the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford (Major O'Gorman) say, one after the other, that they had received threatening letters from the advocates of the Sunday Closing Movement in Ireland, threatening them with—I do not know what penalties, if they opposed this measure. This sending of threatening letters is a thing greatly to be deprecated. It is a proceeding which should be visited by the House with its greatest displeasure; and, further, it is a proceeding which is not at all likely to further the object which it has in view. But, Sir, I do not think that this practice, most objectionable as it confessedly is, is altogether confined to one side; I think we have heard of threats being uttered against those who support this Bill. But from whichever side threatening letters are sent, I believe their effect to be bad. Any man of an independent character will feel that he ought not to yield to this kind of coercion, and the effect of such a letter upon him would be that if he was in doubt before, he would immediately go over to the opposite direction. Therefore, I say this is a foolish policy to adopt on the part of those who desire the success of the principles they advocate. For myself, I may say that I have been in receipt of no threatening letter on this subject. I support the second reading of this Bill on the same grounds as I have supported a similar measure on former occasions; and I do it because I believe that it will do the country more good than its rejection, and my support to the Bill is not due to any manifestation by my constituency either one way or the other. I will now pass for a moment to consider the arguments of the hon. Member for Dundalk. He attacked the memorials and Petitions which had been presented in favour of the measure on the ground that, although they were signed by a great number of people, yet they were not the people who would be affected by the closing of public-houses on Sundays. The hon. Gentleman asks—"Who are these people; are they the people who use public-houses?" And he replies—"No, they are magistrates, clergymen, and people belonging to the upper classes; people who do not want such places of resort, and who never use them;" and the hon. Member thinks on this ground that we should attach no weight to their opinion. [Mr. CALLAN: Hear!] I am glad the hon. Member agrees that I have not misrepresented him, because I shall directly fix him with some inconsistency with regard to these memorialists. After informing the House that no weight must be attached to the opinions of these magistrates, clergymen, and persons belonging to the upper classes, in support of the closing of public-houses, the hon. Member proceeds almost immediately to quote the evidence given in favour of the keeping open of public-houses on Sundays, given before a Committee of this House, and by whom? By the working classes? No; but by magistrates, clergymen, and people of the upper classes, whose opinions the hon. Member says are of no value when in favour of the closing of public-houses. I should have thought that when the hon. Member made up his mind to oppose the Bill that he would have prepared himself with evidence to prove conclusively to the House that there existed a strong feeling in Ireland against the measure. I should have expected that he would have come armed with memorials and Petitions against the measure from those classes of society who do use the public-houses. But, I have looked in vain for any argument from the hon. Member to prove that any strong feeling exists amongst the working classes in the country against the Bill. This is not a new question. It has been for a long time before the country, and, according to the hon. Member, has been fully discussed by the working classes, who had pronounced against it in the most marked manner to him by thousands.

MR. CALLAN: I beg the hon. Member's pardon. I distinctly stated that during the last six months I had been largely amongst the artizan classes of the City of Dublin, amounting to more than 100,000, and that I found a very strong feeling existed amongst them against the Bill.

THE O'CONOR DON: Then why is it that this strong opinion is not embodied in some tangible form and presented before the House? If such a feeling does exist, why is it that the licensed victuallers have not flooded this House with memorials and Petitions signed by working men? The licensed victuallers of Ireland are not an ignorant and brutal race; they are intelligent, and know very well how to protect their own interests; they have of late years spent large sums of money, and studied greatly to successfully organize an agitation against this Sunday Closing Movement. As I have said, the Bill is not new, and if the feeling exists which the hon. Member for Dundalk says does exist, it should have taken a tangible form. I may remind the House that the movement for the closing of public-houses on Sundays is neither a party nor a religious one, notwithstanding that the hon. Member for Dundalk endeavours to impress on the House that there is something of a religious character mixed up with it, for he says that the Bill springs from the Sabbatarian feelings of the people of the North of Ireland. But if he be not mistaken, how does he account for the support which is given the Bill by the Roman Catholic priesthood in counties where their influence dominates; and how does he account for the fact that in three Roman Catholic dioceses in Ireland this measure has been voluntarily put into operation through the influence of the Roman Catholic clergy? We have heard before that this is a class question; that it is legislating for one class, and by another; that we are legislating against the working classes, and against them exclusively; and we are asked, with somewhat of an air of triumph—"If this is not class legislation, then why is it that you do not extend the provisions of the measure to clubs?" I deny that this is class legislation, except so far as arises out of the circumstances of the parties. The general rule of this country is that there shall be no trading on Sundays, and as there is an exception in favour of the liquor traffic, all that this Bill asks is, that that exception shall no longer exist. I believe that the bakers' and the butchers' shops must be closed on Sundays; in shutting these shops on Sundays it might be said that we are shutting them against a particular class, for the rich man can get his bread and meat at his club, and the poor man cannot; and therefore you legislate against the class who cannot have their clubs. But that is not so; the baker and the butcher are closed against all alike, and working men may have their clubs as well as the rich, and then they will suffer from no restrictions which do not affect the rich. All that is asked by the Bill is that there shall be no exception made in Sunday trading for the liquor traffic. So far as clubs are concerned, they are used for different purposes than those for which public-houses are used; and if the time should arrive when clubs were used by their members for the one purpose of Sunday drinking, then I believe that some hon. Member would be found to possess sufficient courage to rise in his place and ask that those clubs should be shut on Sundays. But, Sir, why is it that an exception is made in favour of this particular commodity? It is obvious that it arose from the custom of the working classes to drink beer along with their meals; and as it was not desirable for working people to lay in a stock of beer over night, exception was made for public-houses to open on Sundays for the sale of beer. That may be a very good reason for the opening of public-houses on Sundays in England, but it does not apply to Ireland, where beer is but little drunk by the working classes, and very little drinking of any sort of spirituous liquors takes place at the time of meals. When the Irish working man drinks, it is not at his meals, and it is something more potent than beer—it is whisky. He drinks this whisky at an hour which has nothing whatever to do with meal times; and therefore the deprivation of power to purchase whisky at meal times would not in any way interfere with the comfort of the Irish working man. The reason which I have given for the opening of public-houses on Sundays does, therefore, not apply to Ireland. If the feeling of the people of Ireland is not largely in favour of this measure, then it will not work satisfactorily; but I believe that the feeling of the people of the country is largely in its favour. Should any difficulty, however, arise in the working of the measure, it would, no doubt, be in the large centres of industry, such as Cork, Belfast, and Dublin; but the great good which its operation would effect throughout the entire country would much more than make up for any difficulties which might arise in the large towns. The opponents to this measure sometimes cite the case of Scotland, where public-houses are closed on the Sunday, but where they say that a large amount of Sunday drinking is carried on. I am not conversant with the customs of Scotland; hon. Members representing Scotch constituencies may be able to afford us some information on that subject; but from my knowledge of my own countrymen I can say that not one out of ten would shut himself up in his own house for the purpose of private and solitary drinking. The majority of Irishmen drink from a social feeling, and not from the mere pleasure of drinking. These, then, Sir, are my reasons for supporting the Bill. I believe that, if it passed into law, that it would be attended by very great beneficial results; I support it with the full consciousness that there will be difficulties in the way of carrying its provisions into operation in the large centres of population; and I am ready to admit that, unless the Bill is in harmony with the general feelings of the population, that it will practically fail in its operations; but, in spite of all difficulties and chances of failure, I believe that a Bill putting a stop to the sale of intoxicating liquors on Sundays will prove a great boon to the people of Ireland; and, notwithstanding that some disadvantages may be urged against it, the advantages to be derived from it are immensely in its favour.

MR. KAVANAGH said, that, in supporting the second reading of the Bill, he felt constrained to assign some of the reasons which had induced him to alter his opinion on the subject. He had hitherto resisted its passage, on the ground that he thought it savoured of class legislation, and that it was an interference with the rights of the working man; but further consideration of the subject had led him to think more favourably of it, and induced him to form the opinion that when society was unable to regulate its own actions, in accordance with the rules of propriety, then it was the time for, and the duty of, the Legislature to interfere. He had had brought before him overwhelming evidence of the evils produced in Ireland by Sunday drinking, and of the overwhelming desire of the great body of the people that the Legislature should deal with the matter as proposed by the Bill now before the House. He had heard many objections urged, but he was not scared by the fear that the passing of this Bill would lead to what some described as private and illicit drinking. He knew the people well, and he did not believe that, although easily led and prone to yield to temptation, their character was that of besotted drunkards. So far from it, the Irish people possessed many high and many estimable qualities, the standard of morality of the nation was considerably above the average, and if we could provide or guard against two principal causes, Ireland might challenge the world for immunity from crime. The two causes to which he alluded were these—first, disloyalty and discontent, originating in past mismanagement, and now kept alive by unceasing agitation, with the crimes which had grown out of that cause. Government had been endeavouring to deal with it of late, and he was sorry to say, had met with but qualified success, and for this reason that legislation had been directed to lop the branch, and not to cut the root. The second cause of crime in Ireland was drunkenness, and in coming here that day to ask the House to pass that Bill, they were asking the House not to lop the branch, not to deal only with effect, to lay the axe to the root, for he believed that Sunday drinking was the most prolific cause of the crimes which filled the Irish calendars, and Irish Members came there with one accord to ask Parliament to mitigate that evil and remove the temptation. They did not come as unreasoning beings to seek for impossibilities, they came with a request, and with the request they pointed out the means to grant it, and he thought a request of that nature, prompted by the best intentions, and practically certain to be productive of the best results, should not be lightly refused. He should say no more, but give the second reading of the Bill his most cordial support.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he had a Petition to present from a town in the county of Wexford in favour of the Bill.

MR. SPEAKER said, he must remind the hon. Baronet that he was not in Order in presenting a Petition at that stage of the proceedings.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that if it was too late to present a Petition he would proceed to make a few remarks on the Bill before the House. It was impossible to deny that there was a popular feeling in Ireland in favour of this measure. In the county of Wexford that feeling was universal, and he had presented many Petitions from it in favour of the Bill, as also had his hon. Colleague; but he was not aware of a single Petition having been presented against it, although there might, perhaps, have been one or two. That county presented a singular exception in respect to Sunday closing which might, perhaps, be surprising to English Members. Some time ago the Bishop, who was the diocesan of the county, published a pastoral letter, in which he recommended the total closing of all public-houses on Sunday, and that letter was immediately confirmed, and he was followed in his endeavours by the ministers of Protestant denominations, and now in the whole county of Wexford the public-houses were, by ecclesiastical authority, totally closed on Sundays. That being the state of things in such a large county, it clearly showed, beyond contradiction, that there was a strong feeling in Ireland in favour of Sunday closing, and, indeed, certain peculiar circumstances which had been alluded to by his hon. Friend behind him explained why that was so. No doubt, it was extremely objectionable that people coming out of places of worship should go into a public-house, because when they got there, having nothing to do, they were likely to drink too much. As they did not want the liquor for their meals, there could be no reason why the public-houses should not be closed on the Sunday. The religious observances of that day were certainly beneficial to the morals of the people. One reason why he was anxious to address the House on this subject was to guard himself against being considered inconsistent if he did not take the same view of this subject as applied to England. If hon. Members went into one of our streets inhabited by the working classes on a Sunday between 1 and 2 o'clock, they would see in every direction children going to fetch beer for the family dinner. An English mechanic or labourer, if he was a respectable man, looked with satisfaction to the comfort of his family dinner on the Sunday, and if he was deprived of his beer he could not enjoy his dinner. It was well known that if beer was drawn on the Saturday, it was unfit to drink on the Sunday, and therefore it was extremely undesirable that the people should be deprived of the opportunity of sending for beer to drink with their Sunday dinner. He thought, therefore, that in this country it was well that during a portion of the Sunday public-houses were allowed to open, and he was not sure that the restrictions as to closing on that day were not carried too far, because, as the law stood, no man could get anything to eat or drink in a public-house from 3 to 6 o'clock. A man wanted his dinner before he went to church in the evening, and unless he could get it in his own house he could not get it until 6 o'clock. He thought the law might be very much improved in this country, so as to enable public-houses to keep open not for the sake of drinking, but for the sale of food, between the hours of 3 and 6 o'clock. The present restriction was too great for the comfort and convenience of the people. No doubt, legislation could take away what were called the occasions of sin to a great extent, and so far that legislation was good; but still he did not think they could make people sober by Act of Parliament. For that, they must trust to the good sense and the education of the people, and to the influence of the clergy of all denominations. That was the only way to make people sober. If they interfered unnecessarily with the customs of the people they only made themselves unpopular and created a sort of retroactive feeling against the cause of temperance, and might promote a feeling of discontent amongst the lower classes, because, argue as much as they would about the clubs, they could not get rid of the idea that a rich man could get what he liked at his club, whereas the poor man had his club, which was the public-house, shut against him. All the argument in the world would not convince a poor man that there was any difference between the two places, especially as he knew perfectly well that refreshment in the clubs had to be paid for. It was true a member had to go through a certain form of election, but in other respects a club was a place of refreshment. When a poor man passed along Pall Mall and saw the clubs open, at which the members could get anything they liked, he no doubt had a sort of unpleasant feeling that he was not so favourably circumstanced, and that was a feeling which they ought to prevent as much as possible. The case was different in Ireland, as the hon. Member for Roscommon had pointed out; and it was because of this difference that he should support the second reading of the Bill.

MR. FORSYTH said, he did not wish to give a silent vote on this question. As he intended to vote for the second reading, he would briefly explain his reasons for doing so. Strong appeals had been made to him, as he had no doubt they had been to other hon. Members, both by the advocates and opponents of this measure, and in the vote he was going to give he dared say he should offend some whose good opinion he wished to retain. But he was bound to vote according to his judgment and conscience, and he was not afraid that he should not be able to defend his conduct, if it should hereafter be attacked. Now, the first reason he should give for voting for this Bill was, that this was a question on which they were bound very much to defer to the opinion and wishes of the great majority of the Irish Members. This was no political question, or one affecting the integrity of the Empire, but it was entirely a question as regarded the social condition of the people of Ireland; and he should like to know who were so fit and competent to advise the House upon and to represent the wishes, the opinions, the habits, and the feelings of the people of Ireland as the Irish Members. The House had been told that day, and truly told, that on a former occasion, when this Bill was before them, the majority of the Irish Members in favour of it was no less than four to one; and he believed that that proportion correctly represented the wish of the Irish people themselves. He had been very much struck by perusing the memorial to which reference had been made, and which was signed by many thousands of people in favour of the Bill. Amongst the signatories were upwards of 1,800 magistrates, 1,000 Episcopalian clergymen, 800 Roman Catholic clergy, 520 Nonconformists, upwards of 700 surgeons, 1,900 Poor Law Guardians, and 1,000 Town Councillors and Commissioners. It was impossible to have a more thoroughly representative memorial than that which was signed by these gentlemen. He found in this memorial, which was put forth under the auspices of the Association for the Prevention of the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sundays, that the association had for its Vice President the Archbishop of Dublin, and that there were connected with it 10 Bishops and a number of other gentlemen holding high positions in Ireland. It had been said in the course of the debate—he thought by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan)—that many Petitions presented to that House were manufactured Petitions; but that term could not be applied to a Petition signed by such high dignitaries and officials as those he had mentioned. Now, what did he find in this memorial, vouched by so many respectable men, who were competent to judge of the feeling of the people of Ireland? He found they asserted that drunkenness was increasing. The Returns for 1873 showed that there had been 95,000 committals against 82,000 in 1872; and the memorialists asserted that the amount of drinking which took place in Ireland was the cause of an immense deal of poverty, wretchedness, and crime; and they went on to say—and these were the words of men who would not commit themselves to rash statements—that—

“The public-houses were kept open in Ireland against the constitutionally expressed wish of a great majority of the Irish people, including a large number of the licensed traders themselves.”

Now, what did Parliament do with regard to Scotland? Twenty years ago a Bill was brought in for closing public-houses in Scotland on Sundays. In England they had never been closed all day on Sundays. That Bill was supported by the Scotch Members, and what was the consequence? It became purely a Scotch question; and the House, deferring to the wishes of the Scotch Members, passed what was known as the Forbes-Mackenzie Act. That had been passed 20 years ago; and although some hon. Members talked of private drinking in Scotland on Sundays, no one had pretended that that Act had not worked beneficially, and there had been no successful attempt to repeal it. But then it was said that if they voted for this Bill as regarded Ireland, they must, to be consistent, vote for it as regarded England. That was the sort of bugbear with which the House was threatened. In the first place, the national beverage of England was entirely different from that of Ireland. The common beverage in England was beer; and, although he was sorry to say that a great deal of drunkenness existed from the consumption of beer, yet that was not to be compared to the drunkenness induced by the fiery nature of the whisky drunk in Ireland. He believed beer, when drunk in moderation, to be most strengthening; but he never heard anyone say that whisky was strengthening. All it did was to inflame the blood. It might, perhaps, support waning energies for a moment, but no one's strength increased by drinking whisky. More than that, the habits of the English were different from those of the Irish people. In England, we were content with the system which now existed for restricting drinking on the Sunday, and there was no general feeling against the law as it stood; whereas, in Ireland, he ventured to say that there was an enormously preponderating mass of public opinion in favour of Sunday closing. Then he had another reason for voting in favour of the second reading of this Bill. The House had been engaged a long time, and would be engaged for some time longer, in passing a Peace Preservation Bill. That Bill had been truly described as nothing more or less than a Coercion Bill. They were about to deprive Ireland of the constitutional rights which every Englishman and Scotchman enjoyed. He had voted for that Bill with great reluctance, but he had done it because he put perfect confidence in the present Ministry, who told them that the Bill was necessary in order to preserve peace in Ireland. He had therefore supported it, although reluctantly; but in doing that he would say that the House ought to remove every temptation to disorder in Ireland. No man could deny that the annals of the Assizes and Quarter Sessions showed that a great proportion of the crime in Ireland was due to intoxicating liquors. Now, he wanted to be able, as soon as possible, to get rid of these Coercion Acts, and not give the Ministry an excuse for saying that they were to be continued because there had been an increase of crime in Ireland. The House ought therefore to remove every temptation to disorder, and do all it possibly could to make the people moral, industrious, and sober. It might be said that there was no connection between Ribbonism and drunkenness, and at first sight there appeared to be none; but he could show that there was. What led to poverty, to pauperism, to want of moral stamina? It was drunkenness. And, depend upon it, the men who would be most open to the influence of Ribbonism, sedition, and conspiracy, were those who had been demoralized and pauperized by drink. Therefore, in the interests of the Irish people, and with the view as far as he could, by the vote he was going to give, to make them more industrious, moral, and sober, he should vote for the second reading of this Bill. He would say one word with reference to the objection which had been urged by the hon. and gallant Member for Waterford (Major O'Gorman), that they wanted to have one law for the rich and another for the poor, and to that of the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan), that this was class legislation. But what was that which now existed with respect to the sale of intoxicating liquors but, in a certain sense, class legislation? Public-houses were partially closed on Sundays, but clubs were not; and this might be called class legislation. The only other objection was that to close the public-houses would entail a loss upon the country. The only Petitions against this Bill were signed by the publicans in Dublin, and of course they would lose a certain amount of money by the loss of the sale of drink which they would otherwise have on the Sunday. But he thought it would be a great boon to the licensed victuallers of Ireland to be able to have one day's rest out of the seven. And when they talked of loss, he might mention that, as they had recently heard in that House, when a crime was committed in any particular locality in Ireland, it was visited by a pecuniary penalty on the district as compensation for the injury sustained; and if this fruitful source of crime was removed, it might be expected that the loss sustained by the closing of public-houses would be compensated for to some extent by a diminution of crime. The only loss which would be felt would be by the Chancellor of the Exchequer; but his right hon. Friend would, he was sure, far rather lose a little sum of money from the sale of spirits than receive an income connected with the intoxication of the people. For the reasons he had given he should vote for the second reading of this Bill.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that apart from the licensed victuallers, with whom he should not deal, and who appeared perfectly able to defend themselves in the matter, Ireland was divided into two classes on this subject. On the one hand there were the upper and middle classes, who, in many parts of Ireland, and indeed all over the country, had expressed a strong opinion in favour of this Bill. According to their, not unanimous, but preponderating, opinion, it was desirable to inflict restrictions, which, it must be remarked, would not interfere with their Sunday enjoyment, on the millions, in order that certain sections of the millions might have their temptations lessened, and that their scale of morality might be raised. Now, it was a remarkable fact that the strength of opinion amongst these upper and middle classes varied considerably in the different phases of those classes in Ireland. There was no doubt that this Bill had received a large amount of support on the part of those who sympathized generally with the people; but it was still more certain that the main strength of the support of this class lay in the advocacy of men who on general topics had very different identity and very little sympathy with the people. He should be sorry to say that any Irishman was consciously influenced by an indirect or improper motive in supporting the Bill; but it was well known in Ireland that the feeling of many of those who supported it was far from being as unmixed as they themselves believed. In the first place, it was supported by some—he would not say there were many of any creed or shade of politics—to whose conviction it was very hard to bring home this principle—that the poor man was entitled to a paramount voice on this question, or, indeed, to any voice at all. They argued that a certain percentage of Irishmen were vicious and incorrigible drunkards, and that, as they had satisfactory experience of what an Act of Parliament could do and of what it could prevent in Ireland, they would proceed to make the Irish people sober by compulsion. It was a pity that some of the supporters of this Bill, both in and out of that House, grounded their conduct, partially, no doubt, on sound moral reasons, but also on political reasons which were of a very distinct character, and of a character that was exceedingly odious to the Irish people, and particularly to those sections of them who would be affected by this legislation. He had heard, both in and out of that House, Irish gentlemen who supported measures of repression like this, but objected to the most moderate concession of the Government as to the Coercion Acts as revolutionary, advocate Sunday closing because, as they alleged, and as the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone had just said in the most courteous way, it would deprive the Irish artisans and labourers of the temptation of discussing seditious and lawless topics, which, under the influence of the bottle, they would be disposed to discuss on Sunday afternoons. In other words, it was well known that, whatever might be the merits of this Bill, the enormities of the evils against which it was directed, or the arguments in support of it, there was a certain well-defined class of influential Irishmen who supported it because, amongst other reasons, it was a satisfactory accompaniment of the Peace Preservation Act. The Gentlemen who had brought forward this Bill, and had presented the memorial which bore the signatures of so many professional men, ecclesiastics, and merchants responsible for the peace and prosperity of the country, had sent a circular to all the Irish Members, in which it appeared they relied on this memorial as the strongest and most conclusive evidence of the opinion of the people of Ireland in favour of this Bill. Now, this memorial did not purport to come from any of the millions who were to be restricted by this measure from an enjoyment which was sometimes abused, but which in the majority of cases was perfectly innocent. He wished to call attention to a remarkable fact connected with the signatures to that memorial. The number of Catholic Bishops and clergymen in Ireland was, he believed, equal to that of all the Protestant clergy and dignitaries of every other denomination taken together, and from his recollection of the memorial there were attached to it about 1,600 or 1,700 names of Protestant clergy and dignitaries, and only the names of 12 or 13 Catholic Bishops and about 650 Catholic priests. No one—and least of all those who advocated this measure—would dare to insinuate that the Catholic priest was less alive to the evils of intemperance than the Protestant clergyman. Unfortunately, in Ireland the Catholic priest had to cope with intemperance in greater force than the parson. It was amongst the humbler people in all countries that this evil most existed. In Ireland the humbler class consisted mainly of Catholics, and he asked why it was that they found what was comparatively speaking so small a number of Catholic clergymen and Bishops affixing their names to this Memorial? Within the last 48 hours he asked an Irish gentleman of perfect sobriety and great intelligence, what the Bishop of his diocese, which was one of the most Catholic in Ireland, was doing about this Bill; and he told him that his Bishop was not actually opposed to the Bill, but rather looked to other measures for the permanent triumph of temperance in Ireland. The Bishop was beginning to think that compulsion could not cure this evil; that it would only irritate the people to whom it was applied without their assent; and that possibly it might not develop to its most desirable extent the results hoped for by those who pressed for this measure in its entirety. He might be told that a vast number of other Catholic priests and Bishops, amongst whom was his own Bishop, had signed Petitions in favour of this Bill. That was perfectly true; but he had talked to many people in Ireland who had signed these Petitions, and he found that an idea prevailed in their minds that they did not want Sunday closing in its entirety, but only such restrictions against Sunday drinking as would prevent the excesses which now disgraced the Sabbath in Ireland. He believed these were the views of many of the Roman Catholic clergymen and Bishops, and that if the cases of many of those whose names were absent from the Memorial were inquired into, it would be found that, while they were in favour of strong measures of restriction, they hesi-tated to press for Sunday closing entirely. He strongly suspected that in those districts where voluntary closing existed illicit drinking went on, notwithstanding the admirable conduct of those districts as a rule. But there was a question to be considered before that of the utility of Sunday closing, and that was—had the masses in Ireland, or any preponderance of them, given any assent at all to this Bill? If they had not, hon. Members were attempting to enforce the virtue of temperance without consulting the millions whom this Bill would affect. By attempting to force this measure they were only irritating the class whom they wished to regenerate. If the masses did not assent to the restrictions sought to be imposed upon them, the Bill, if it passed, would be a failure; and if it was a failure in a country which, he was sorry to say, was torn by dissensions, it would be the best proof that could ever be given that they could not make people moral or sober without their consent by law. When they called to mind the active organization supporting this Bill, they could not regard the fact of 200,000 signatures as a proof that, in a population of 5,000,000, there was anything like that preponderating assent which would entitle the House to pass this Bill. But it would be said that there were no Petitions on the other side. There was no money amongst the masses to get up organizations for petitioning in a case of this kind. It was a remarkable fact that even the publicans had not attempted to do it. That showed, at all events, that the publicans were not really at the bottom of the opposition to this Bill. They had not subscribed anything towards getting up any opposition to it, and from all he had heard the working class did not believe there was any possibility of this extreme measure becoming law. That accounted, to a certain extent, for their indifference. He did not say what ought to be their opinions, but this he did say—that if it was assumed by the House that the people of Ireland had assented to this measure, while the fact was not so, the passing of the Bill would be dangerous to the public peace. No doubt, Petitions had been sent in in its favour; but in many of the great centres of population, meetings had been held which had by no means been unanimous. Take the city of Limerick, which he represented. A public meeting was held in that city, the result of which was a great deal of confusion and disturbance. He was not present at that meeting, but on making inquiries how it had gone off, one gentleman told him that the temperance resolutions were passed with the greatest enthusiasm. Another gentleman told him that the amendments to these resolutions were agreed to; and a third gentleman informed him that such was the enthusiasm of the meeting that they passed both the resolutions and the amendments with the most unbroken unanimity. The hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Callan) had moved an Amendment in the way of rejection of the Bill. Well, in the town of Dundalk a public meeting was held in favour of the Bill—there was a difference of opinion, and brickbats were substituted for arguments. [Mr. FORSTER: By its opponents.] Yes; by its opponents. But the fact itself showed how the Bill would be received in Ireland by the people if it became law. Another meeting had been held at Sligo, where the proceedings were so humorous, that a most respectable and sober gentleman, who was the leading speaker, was accused by a local wit of adjourning to a public house and drinking a quart of whisky. The Petitions which had been sent to that House were mainly got up by people who would be unaffected by the measure; but the instances which he had given, and others which might be adduced in many towns and villages in Ireland, showed that the people of Ireland were not prepared for this legislation, and in no case could it be assumed that they had assented to the Bill, or demanded it from that House. If they took and placed the matter fairly before the Irish people, and they were invited to express their feeling as to the expediency of placing more severe restrictions upon drinking, he was sure that any reasonable proposals which might be considered necessary would be agreed to. No such course had been taken; no such agreement existed now, and he must advise the House to exercise a degree of caution in this instance.

MR. MACARTNEY: The hon. Member who last spoke said that certain classes in Ireland, whom he termed the wealthy and upper classes, had from interested motives promoted and were supporting this Bill; that was, they asked for it as an adjunct and supplement to the Peace Preservation Bill. But a more unfounded accusation or a more baseless assertion he (Mr. Macartney) had never heard made.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY denied that he had said so. He merely intimated that in some quarters it was so regarded.

MR. MACARTNEY: The hon. Member spoke of them as not being of the people, or the leaders of the people, and therefore he must mean those who were above the people. He had even said that a large number of the clergy had not supported the Bill; but he (Mr. Macartney) would point out that it was very difficult to go to everybody with a Petition, and there were therefore many who wished well to the cause and who had not signed the Petitions. He believed that the bulk of the clergy of every denomination in Ireland were in favour of the measure. He could speak for his own county (Tyrone), that the Representatives of every town had either that year or last signed Petitions in favour of the Bill, and every Board of Guardians and almost every other public body had been favourable to it. He had very carefully examined the Petitions, and he believed them to be perfectly genuine. The publicans of the county had no objection to Sunday closing, and the feeling being so strongly in favour of it he could not see any ground for the rejection of the Bill. If such a course was pursued it would be a strong argument for Irish Members to use, that notwithstanding the great feeling which existed in favour of the Bill, an English Parliament would not pass it. He would ask the House to weigh that very carefully, and in the interest of morality and with the view of obtaining a proper observance of the Sabbath, to pass the measure. In his part of the country a great many funerals took place on Sunday, and almost every person thought it his duty to attend the interment of those he had been acquainted with. After the funeral was over, the representatives of the deceased persons felt it incumbent upon them to entertain their friends, and often the whole party went from the burial ground—from a solemn and impressive scene—to the public-house, where scenes of riot and debauchery took place. If it happened that there were two or three funeral parties differing in religion or politics, the chances were that words were followed by an exchange of blows. He, as a magistrate, had a painful recollection of being frequently called upon on Sunday to commit people for drunkenness, and the next worst time for these offences was on Monday morning; and, he would ask, should such a state of things be continued? He would say no more upon the subject, because he thought it better that many Irish Members should rise and speak upon the Bill than that any of them should make long speeches. But he hoped the House would pause before it rejected the Petition of a large majority of the people of Ireland.

MR. O'SULLIVAN said, he did not speak against the Bill last year, nor perhaps would he have done so this year were it not for the arguments brought forward by its supporters. One of those arguments was, that the Bill was supported by a large majority of the Irish people. He denied that assertion, for a greater fallacy was never brought before that House. True it was that the Bill was supported by a large number of people in Ireland, but they were not the people who would be directly affected by this Bill, as very few of its supporters ever resorted to a public-house for their refreshments. They could well afford to have those refreshments at home. He had presented several Petitions from constituents of his in favour of the Bill. He took the trouble of looking over the names on some of those Petitions, and he found that three-fourths of them were composed of people who could afford to keep well-stocked cellars. So he need hardly tell the House it was no inconvenience to those people to close public-houses on Sunday, but what was the case with those thousands of poor workmen, day-labourers and servants, who never went near a public-house from one end of the week to the other, who worked hard throughout the week, and then went to the next town to enjoy a few pints of beer or a few glasses of grog on Sundays? Sunday was their only day for refreshment. What, were they called on to enact by that Bill? They were asked to enact what he must call a Coercive Bill against the poor working class in Ireland, which Bill they dared not enact against the workmen in this country. He did not rise to advocate any additional liberties for drunkards, as there was not a man in that House who despised the habitual drunkard more than he did, for next to the misgovernment of his country it had no greater curse than the curse of drunkenness. But it was not because a few unfortunates here and there abused those enjoyments that they must punish all by depriving them of their right to refresh themselves on Sundays after a hard week's work. If the supporters of this Bill asked to limit the hours of sale on Sundays, they would accomplish all they required, and, at the same time, give time enough to people to refresh themselves. With that view, he would suggest that they should allow public-houses to be open for the three hours from 2 till 5, a time in his opinion amply sufficient for the purpose. He must caution the Government against passing this Act, for by doing so they would create a storm in Ireland which they little anticipated, and if passed it must be enforced at the point of the bayonet. The people would justly say it was class legislation which was passed by a Conservative Government. While the rich and idle man could go to his club or his hotel for refreshments on Sundays the poor hard-worked man must go without his refreshments. There was another class of working men in large towns who went a few miles in the country for recreation and amusements on Sundays. Were they going to say they would prevent these men from having a little refreshment when they went to those places? Then there was another class which should be considered, and not bring ruin on themselves and their families, and that was a number of publicans who lived near large towns where the people went, not to get drunk, but simply to amuse themselves on Sundays and take some refreshments before they returned home. Were they going to destroy those poor people whose principal trade was on Sundays and holidays? Were they going to destroy their business for the purpose of carrying out that unconstitutional idea, for if so, he should oppose the Bill.

MR. O'REILLY DEASE said, that as his constituents were very much interested in the question, he desired to occupy the attention of the House for a short time. He had presented more Petitions on that than on any other question, and they were not signed by rich people—by magistrates and others of that class—but largely, very largely, by the labouring classes. He had practical experience of what Sunday closing could do. He wished emphatically to say that in the district he represented, one of the most painful duties the magistrates had to discharge on Mondays was to deal with the number of persons brought up before them for having been drunk on Sunday. There had been in his district a voluntary abandonment of Sunday drinking and a shutting up of public-houses, and the results had been perfectly marvellous. The place was not the same in any sense—quiet and peace and good order taking the place of brawls and tumult. He had since then met many labouring men, who had told him that they would not go back to the old style of drinking on Sundays for anything that could be offered to them, and even the publicans felt it to be an improvement. He was certain that the public opinion of Ireland of all classes was largely in favour of this measure. Catholic and Protestant, rich and poor, desired it, and he could only say that he believed that if the Government took up the measure and passed it, it would be the best Peace Preservation measure that could be given to Ireland. It was said—and he agreed with it—they could not make people sober by Act of Parliament; but let the House take care not to make them drunk by Act of Parliament. He cordially supported the second reading.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, that on questions of the kind at present under notice, which were of a purely social character, it was the duty of the House and the Government to pay especial deference to the opinions of hon. Members who represented that part of the Kingdom to which the measure was proposed to be applied. But while he was anxious to afford full weight to that consideration, he, at the same time, claimed for both the House and the Government the right to exercise that individual judgment upon the facts before them without which their proceedings would be absolutely useless. His own belief was that the case could be argued without any reference whatever either to England or Scotland. That reference, however, having been made, it might be fairly argued, in reply, that Sunday closing in Scotland had not materially lessened drunkenness in that country, and that if the consumption of liquor had decreased there, it was chiefly due to the duty on spirits having been quadrupled. Moreover, it had been shown that no fewer than 490 houses had been voluntarily closed on Sunday in Edinburgh before an Act for compulsory closing was even proposed. But what was the case in respect to Ireland? Why, a system of six days' licensing had been adopted in that country, and he was bound to say that, although they had been told that the Irish publicans were anxious for the adoption of Sunday closing, he had not found that they were ready to take out the six days' licences, which would not only have enabled them to close on Sundays, but would have saved them a part of the tax for the licence which they now paid. It was contended that the Irish people representing every creed and class were united in wishing for this great boon. Now, in reference to that point, he only wished that everyone had heard the speech of the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy). He had put that argument on a fair and proper basis. These were questions which were not appreciated by the mass of the people—whom, after all, they mainly concerned—until the laws relating to them were actually passed, or, perhaps, even until those laws were actually put in force. He ventured to say that there was no more idea among the working classes of Ireland that the Bill under discussion was likely to become law than there was among the working classes of England that it would come into operation here. He wished to give all due weight to the opinions expressed by the clergymen, magistrates, town councillors, guardians of the poor, and employers of labour who had signed the Memorial presented to the Prime Minister, and he recognized their sincere belief that the Bill would promote temperance among others; but very few, if any, of the memorialists would be themselves practically affected in their daily life if the Bill were passed. Why, what had been their experience? In 1854 an Act was introduced for materially restricting the hours during which public-houses in England, and especially in the metropolis, were to be open on Sunday, and it was passed with practical unanimity. But in the following year, when the people affected by it found out what had been done, such tumult and disorder arose that the Act had to be speedily repealed. Again, the Permissive Bill of the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle had been brought forward, he knew not how often, and supported by Petitions numerous signed, and on one occasion it obtained a second reading. [Sir WILFRID LAWSON: I beg pardon; I am very sorry to say it never did.] Well, at any rate, it very nearly achieved that success; but even the hon. Baronet, sanguine as he might be, must be one of the first to acknowledge that his project had not recently advanced in popular favour. And why was this? Because since its original introduction the people had become familiar with its scope and intent, and were determined that it should not become law. They were told that Petitions containing tens of thousands of signatures had been presented in favour of the present Bill; but in one Session Petitions having 1,000,000 of signatures attached to them were presented in favour of the very same measure for England, and yet it would now be generally admitted that in this country absolute Sunday closing would be impossible. Those facts proved that they could not take as an infallible test of public opinion in any part of the United Kingdom expressions in favour of a proposal of that kind, emanating, as they had so largely done in that case, from the middle and upper classes. Meetings had been held in Ireland, more or less numerous attended, in support of this Bill; but in some instances, and notably at Limerick, the result was an absolute riot, in which nobody knew positively what decision was come to on the question. But if a riot was caused merely by the discussion of this measure at a public meeting, what would be the effect if the people found to their surprise that this Bill had become law? The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone said the passing of the measure would remove disorder in Ireland; but his (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's) own impression was that it would rather tend to create disorder. Last autumn he received at Dublin a deputation strongly in favour of the Bill from working men in various centres of population in Ireland;

but on questioning them he failed to discover any evidence of their authority to speak on behalf of the class they professed to represent. Nay more, on a closer examination, he found out that they were all teetotalers, and that therefore they were the representatives of a class who were not affected by the provisions of this Bill. The main argument in its favour was that it would put a stop to drunkenness in Ireland. He would not approach the consideration of the question from the point from which it had been approached by the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. R. Smyth), that drinking was itself an evil.

MR. R. SMYTH said, he had not stated that, but that, on the contrary, he could not blame those who were willing to sell him intoxicating liquors when he was willing to buy them.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH was very sorry if he had misinterpreted what had been said by the hon. Gentleman; but there could not be a doubt the Bill would be supported by many who thought even the moderate use of intoxicating liquors a great evil. For himself he could not entertain that opinion, nor could he, on the other hand, contend that there should not be any restrictions placed on the sale of spirits on Sundays. Parliament had certainly refused to endorse that principle, for it had enacted that in Ireland in towns of a certain population public-houses should not be open on Sundays, except in the interval between 2 o'clock and 9 o'clock P.M., whilst as regarded all other places, the open hours should be from 2 o'clock to 7 o'clock P.M. Upon the whole, he was of opinion that these restrictions had worked well. He certainly had received some complaints of their having given rise to the sale of intoxicating liquors in unlicensed houses, but still not to such an extent as to call for the interference of the Legislature. But it did not follow that because these restrictions on the hours of keeping open had worked well that the total closing of public-houses on Sundays would not cause a great increase in the number and gains of unlicensed houses. There were only two classes of people whom this Bill could affect. The first was the class of moderate drinkers. For his own part, he could not see any harm, but on the contrary a great deal of good, in persons being able to obtain at a public-house on Sunday that which was moderate and necessary refreshment. This Bill was not necessary to restrain that class of people from drunkenness, but nevertheless it would affect them, and cause them a great deal of inconvenience. What reason was there, by passing a law of this kind, to inconvenience people who, without the restriction of any law, could control the passion for drink? The only reason that could be alleged was, that in no other way could you promote sobriety among another and a smaller class of people who were supposed to be incapable of restraining the propensity to get drunk, and to indulge this propensity to such excess that they could not pass the door of a public-house without yielding to the temptation. But could it be supposed that the total closing of public-houses on Sundays by law would prevent persons so incapable of self-restraint from getting drunk somewhere else? In respect to that argument, he might mention that one of the members of the workmen's deputation which lately waited upon him at Dublin complained that he and his family were annoyed by the noise and drunken riot which took place in houses near them on Sundays. Hearing that complaint, he asked the man at what time of the day the annoyance complained of occurred. The reply he had received was that it occurred on Sunday morning, during the very hours when the public-houses were now legally closed. He did not mean to say that, at the present moment, the drinking in unlicensed houses, or at illegal hours, was very great, but he was fortified by the evidence of the Commissioner of the Dublin Police force in saying that if they were over stringent in dealing with drinking in licensed houses, they would only stimulate the illegal traffic in unlicensed houses. Mr. O'Ferrall, Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, Dublin, stated before a Committee of that House which sat in 1868 that the public-houses in that city were for the most part well-conducted, and that the law was sufficiently stringent; but that if those public-houses were to be superseded on Sunday by unlicensed drinking places, which there was too much reason to fear would be the case if the former were closed all Sunday, the evil of drunkenness would be aggravated instead of lessened. A superintendent of the Dublin Police gave similar evidence. He therefore asked the House seriously to consider whether, if they passed an Act which in large towns was almost certain to be evaded, they would be strengthening the authority of the law in Ireland, or whether they would not, on the contrary, be really weakening it. However great was the improvement which had taken place in the habits and feelings of the Irish people, they were still not too well affected to the law or too anxious to obey it, and therefore they could not do a more mischievous thing than to adopt for Ireland a law that would either be met in that manner, or, if so strictly carried out as really to prevent any sale of drink on Sundays, would infallibly lead to scenes of riot and disorder. He was not speaking without reference to past legislation on this question, for Sunday closing had not been untried in Ireland. In 1807 it was enacted that there should be no sale of spirituous liquors by retail between 12 o'clock on Saturday night and 12 o'clock on Sunday night, nor of wine, beer, cider, porter, or perry on Sundays before 2 o'clock, except to travellers. In 1808 this law was altered to a Sunday Closing Act, under which offenders were subjected to a penalty of 40s. for the first offence and £5 for a second. That remained the law until 1815, in which year it was repealed; he supposed because it did not work. Houses were then allowed to be opened for drinking anything but spirituous liquors, which were to be supplied only to inmates and travellers. In 1833 a regulating Act fixed the open hours from 2 o'clock in the afternoon to 11 o'clock at night, and that remained law until 1872. As already stated, in 1868 the hon. and gallant Member for Longford brought in a Bill for the total closing of public-houses on Sundays, except so far as drink might be supplied with food by eating-house keepers. That Bill was referred to a Select Committee, which sat two months and examined 22 witnesses. From that Committee the Bill emerged as one for opening public-houses in towns from 2 o'clock to 9, and in the country from 2 o'clock to 7—precisely the hours which were established in 1872 by the late Parliament. By the Act of last year the House had imposed further restrictions upon the mode in which licences were issued, and it had passed other provisions designed to check drunkenness.

Notwithstanding, it was said that drunkenness had increased in Ireland. For one, he believed that the recent changes had not been in operation sufficiently long to have had a fair trial, and that the apparent increase of drunkenness was not a little due to the greater vigilance of the police. If, however, the increase was not apparent, but real, the evil would be best met, not by passing laws which would occasion inconvenience to a large number of persons who were not drunkards, but by the magistrates using properly and with discretion the power of punishing drunkards which the law had invested them with, and, further, by such improvements in the discipline of Irish prisons as would insure that the punishment of the drunkard in gaol should be more real than it was at present. He admitted that voluntary Sunday closing had succeeded in the Roman Catholic dioceses of Ferns, Cashel, and Kilmore, thanks to the excellent and salutary influence of the Prelates of those dioceses; but could it be argued that that which succeeded as a voluntary movement must necessarily succeed when compulsorily imposed upon the inhabitants of other dioceses, where its voluntary adoption was admitted to be impossible? Sunday closing had been in operation in one diocese for 15 years and in another for 12; and he wanted to know why this voluntary movement had not been extended to all the other dioceses of Ireland? The reason was that those dioceses which he had named consisted almost entirely of country districts, and the real difficulties of this question arose when you began to deal with the large towns. If total closing on Sundays were extended compulsorily to large towns, one of two evils would arise—either the law would be evaded by unlicensed houses, and consequently drinking would be carried on in a far worse manner than now, because without any legal power of supervision; or, if it were carried out strictly, it would lead to scenes of tumult and disorder which he had rather not contemplate. Those who were in favour of the Bill would be better advised if they would approach the subject tentatively, as it was approached in 1868. If they were to ask that restriction, because it had been successful, should be carried a little further, and that the present hours should be further curtailed, their proposition would deserve the careful attention of the House and of the Government. And if, after due inquiry, such further restrictions should be adopted and should prove successful, it might then be time to consider whether public-houses could be entirely closed on Sunday in the country districts. But as the Bill now before the House proposed immediate and universal Sunday closing, which could not be safely or properly carried into effect, the Government must give it their opposition.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I shall detain the House but a few moments on this question. I think we must all feel that, though there is much to be said against stringent measures of prohibition in regard to the use of strong liquors, there is much to be said in their favour. We have not heard on this occasion—and I am glad of the omission—so much reference as is usual to the unlimited liberty which is enjoyed by the upper classes in respect to the use of spirituous liquors on the Sunday, even although purchased by them in their clubs. On that subject I think it is only necessary to say it would be a very great mistake, whatever difficulties may surround the question of clubs, on their account to withhold from the public the benefits of any measure which appeared on other grounds to be beneficial. For my own part, I do not hesitate to say if, so far as regards spirituous liquors, the difficulty of an invidious distinction between classes was felt to be of a very serious nature, I would rather endeavour even to apply restriction, with some deviation from the usual rules, in the case of the upper classes—the argument being supposed to be general and complete—than I would withhold the advantages of it from the masses of the people. I will not, however, enter into general considerations of the expediency of restrictions, nor speak of the enormous public mischiefs of drunkenness, because I think the scale is turned in the particular case before us, not by the special view I may happen to entertain myself of the balance as between those evils and those advantages generally, but by circumstances peculiar to the case of Ireland. I admit it is rather a serious matter and a responsible act to vote for the second reading of a Bill of this kind, in the face of the objections to it stated by the right hon. Gentleman as the organ of the Government. At the same time, that does not exempt me from the duty of examining, at any rate slightly and briefly, the nature of the objections taken by the right hon. Gentleman. He made a most important admission towards the close of his speech, an admission which appeared to me to cut away from under his feet the whole ground he had laid in justification of the course he intends to pursue. He said that if this were a Bill which dealt only with the country districts and did not embrace the case of the large towns it would, in his judgment, be a Bill that might be properly entertained; but because it embraces the large towns, he proposes to resist the second reading of the Bill. That would be a very intelligible ground, to my mind at least, if Ireland were a country consisting principally of large towns; but how many are there, and what fraction of the whole population do their inhabitants form? It is a country in which nine-tenths and perhaps even four-fifths of the people live outside the large towns. Surely then if the right hon. Gentleman admits that the scope of the Bill is reasonable so far as four-fifths of the people are concerned, the consistent course for him to take would be to support the second reading of the Bill, and when in Committee fairly raise the question of the large towns. In that case all he could say with his usual ability and the weight of the office he fills would be attentively weighed and considered by the House. If logic governed our proceedings we should be entitled, notwithstanding the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and his objection, which we cannot hope to overcome, to claim his vote for the second reading, in consequence of the admission he made as to the suitability of the Bill for the majority of the population. Much has been said as to the probability of disorder in the event of this measure being passed; but I must confess I cannot attach much weight to that consideration, and here I stand mainly upon the negative evidence of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. Armed as the Government is in Ireland, even much more effectually than in England, with the means of collecting the judgment of experienced and responsible officers all over the country through a force controlled strictly by the Executive Government—I mean the Constabulary—I feel perfectly convinced if there had been, in the opinions of those best informed, reason to apprehend general or frequent outbreaks of disorder in Ireland in consequence of the carrying of a Bill like this, the right hon. Gentleman would have been able to come down with such an array of testimony to that effect as would have gone far to silence the arguments of the supporters of the Bill. But only a solitary opinion to that effect was quoted by him and I must say that I attach the greatest consequence to this negative evidence afforded by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. Then the right hon. Gentleman said there might be an apprehension of substituting a system of unlicensed for licensed drinking; but then again there are many who would have been able to give as confident an opinion as the right hon. Gentleman, and to have supported their opinion by powerful evidence, if there were any real and extensive apprehensions upon that subject. It appeared to me that, in alluding to this contingency, which is that of a serious evil, he spoke with proper and becoming reserve, and carefully guarded himself against giving to the House an opinion as to the results of the Bill with that confidence which he would have been justified in assuming if those connected with the collection of the Revenue and the suppression of distillation had been really of opinion that the effect of this Bill would be to cause the substitution of unlicensed for licensed drinking. Without doubt the special feature of the case is the state of opinion in Ireland at the present moment, and I must confess I do attach to that state of opinion the very greatest consequence. We are not now considering an application to place Ireland under laws and in a condition without example in the United Kingdom. A law substantially in conformity with this Bill has been in operation in Scotland for 20 years; and I would observe that the only question with respect to this law, is not whether it has done evil, but whether the amount of good it has done is great or small. That, I think is a fair statement of the case with regard to the Forbes Mackenzie Act in Scotland. Is not this one of the questions on which the people of the Three Kingdoms are in equity fairly entitled to have an opinion for themselves? I have had credit and discredit—to neither of which I am entitled—for having, as was supposed, in this house, delivered myself of the sentiment that Ireland ought to be governed by Irish ideas. I never gave utterance to such a sentiment without appending to it a vital qualification which has been forgotten both by foes and friends. I said that Ireland might be properly and justly governed by Irish ideas on those matters as to which Imperial interests did not call for uniform legislation. It is a fair question to put whether the particular question before us falls into the class of those subjects with respect to which the local opinion, so to call it, of one of the Three Kingdoms is fairly entitled to prevail. Upon that I say that Parliament has already given a judgment in the case of Scotland. There is not a disposition on the part of Parliament to carry into effect a general system for the whole of the United Kingdom, but a special measure has been passed in the case of Scotland. There was a conviction that on the whole Sunday, closing was demanded by the opinion of Scotland, and that we might fairly take the judgment of Scotland for a fair and sufficient indication of the adaptation of a measure to the wants of Scotland. If in that case we yielded to the judgment of Scotland, much more, in the present case, has the judgment of Ireland been clearly expressed. I confess that I must take the liberty of criticizing the speech of the right hon. Gentleman upon this subject. He quoted the opinion of a man of station and education who was unfavourable to this Bill, and anticipated if it were passed the possibility of disorder. The right hon. Gentleman attached weight to that opinion because of the position of the person who gave it. [Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: He was an officer in the Constabulary.] If the right hon. Gentleman had produced a great many more of them, if he had produced something like a real array of commanding opinion, it would have been of the greatest weight in the discussion. I now ask him in consistency, to remember that this opinion, to which he attaches so much importance, was given by a gentleman as much removed from the condition of the ordinary people, as in his view were those who signed the Petitions or the Memorial to the Prime Minister, and that the superiority of position which he treats as a qualification on his own side, he treats as a disqualification on the other side. Am I to be told of 864 Roman Catholic priests who, though not elected officers, are yet persons dependent upon the voluntary support of their congregations, that their judgment forms no indication of the state of opinion in Ireland amongst the lower classes? Assume, if you like, what I am far from conceding, that the opinions of Presbyterian ministers, whose position is essentially that of persons who reflect the popular sentiment, and those of the Episcopal clergy are all to be set aside on the ground of professional prejudice, still what can the right hon. Gentleman and the opponents of the Bill say to the facts that no fewer than 1,991 Poor Law guardians and 596 town councillors are in favour of the principles of the Bill?—the latter being members of municipal bodies representing towns in which the right hon. Gentleman anticipates that disorder, on account of which he is, unfortunately, but inconsistently, going to withhold his assent from the second reading of the Bill. But, indeed, I think that anyone who casts his eye over some pages of the Petitions in favour of the Bill will see that they are in an eminent sense representative of all classes of the community. And if we look to their mere number, while it is true that an unusual number of persons of influence and station have declared their judgment, amounting apparently to 7,681, in their Memorial to the Prime Minister, yet turning to the Petitions I find that no less than 81,000 persons have expressed themselves in that form in favour of the Bill which is before the House. If, however, we really want to know the public sentiment of the country, I must say that I am still more disposed to rely upon the extraordinary testimony which has been yielded for a considerable series of years in the voluntary closing of public-houses in three of the Roman Catholic dioceses. Why, that is one of the most remarkable phenomena to be witnessed either on the face of the United Kingdom, or on the face of the earth. When we consider the strength of the temptations to indulge in drink and to maintain the trade, and find that by a singular combination of conscientious motive on the one hand and of authority resting upon a voluntary basis on the other, this uniform closing of public-houses has been produced in three of the dioceses in Ireland, it is certainly a moral phenomenon most remarkable in itself, and most honourable to the country in which it exists. It is likewise such an indication of the state of Irish opinion as ought really, I think, to put an end to all further discussion upon the question whether the opinion of Ireland is or is not in favour of this Bill. I may also observe that there is another class of cases which ought to be mentioned, where the main argument against the Bill is the apprehension of disorder. I allude to the magistrates of Ireland. If there were persons more than others on their guard against measures which had the slightest tendency to cause disorder, would they not be the magistrates of the country? Yet these magistrates have come forward as signatories to the Memorial to the Prime Minister to the astonishing number of 1,413. Under these circumstances—while endeavouring to keep my promise to the House—I must with very considerable confidence venture to submit to the Government, whether or not it be right in deference to them to consider any question of excepting towns, on which it is totally unnecessary now to express an opinion, our present course, is clear. We have the authority of the precedent of Scotland, and in my opinion it is not less impolitic than it is unjust to interfere by a great phalanx of English votes to prevent a concession to the wishes of Ireland in a matter in which that country is entitled to expect that its wishes shall have effect given to them, and upon which its opinion and judgment have been expressed in a manner which is altogether beyond doubt.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, that as the opinions of the working classes on the Bill in most of the large towns in Ireland had been referred to in the course of the debate, he would detain the House but to inform them that in his constituency (Londonderry) the opinion of the working classes was greatly in favour of the measure. There were, no doubt, many conflicting opinions held upon it, and he himself had received several letters and circulars from different associations of publicans and licensed victuallers in Ireland earnestly entreating him not to support the Bill on grounds which appeared to them to be conclusive, but which appeared to him to be illusory. In the constituency which he had the honour to represent, there were 28,000 inhabitants, and 270 licensed houses. There was a nucleus position could be excited. It was a positive fact, however, that he had had no voice whatever from his constituency against the Bill. On the contrary, he had the honour of presenting a Petition in favour of the measure from his constituency the other day, signed by 1,500 inhabitants of that constituency, and that Petition could not have been got up, except by a most thorough house-to-house canvass, so that the fact of its being in course of signature must have been thoroughly well known in the city, and if there had been any public opinion on the other side, it would surely have been evoked. The lateness of the hour induced him to forbear saying many things which he desired to say. He, however, desired to make an appeal to those who sat on his side of the House. He was one of the 20 Ulster Members who were sent to Parliament generally to support the Government. On the last occasion when that Bill was before the House, 18 of those Ulster Members voted in favour of it. Two hon. Gentlemen were absent, and he very much mistook the opinion of those two hon. Gentlemen, if they would not have voted in favour of it if they had been present. Those 20 Ulster Members represented a great portion of the Conservative element in the Irish constituencies, and he appealed to those who sat on the same side not to overwhelm by their votes the Members who represented Irish constituencies. He appealed to them not to send them back unable to reply to the arguments of Home Rulers, who would then be able to point out that, on a social question upon which Irishmen were substantially agreed, they were overwhelmed by English votes. He was not disposed to believe the slander hurled against hon. Members who sat on that side of the House, that the Conservative Party was placed in power solely by the English publicans; but if they wanted to give force to that opinion—if they desired to turn a political fiction into a plausible fact, they would, upon that occasion, troop out into the Lobby for the purpose of imposing upon the Irish Members those exceptions from which they desired to be free, and at the same time do violence to the great mass of intelligent and respectable public opinion in Ireland—to the Roman Catholic, the Presbyterian, and the Episcopal opinions represented by hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House.

MR. MURPHY, who spoke amid considerable interruption, begged leave to assure the House that he stood there in a particular position. A Committee was appointed in 1868, of which he was a Member, and he would therefore ask hon. Gentlemen, more especially those who were not in the House at that time, to allow him to say a few words. No one was more anxious to put down intemperance than he was, and that, he believed, was the opinion of all right-thinking men, magistrates and others. [Cries of "Divide, divide!"] He believed that, as a Member of the Committee, he was entitled to a fair hearing, and should not be interrupted. There was no point during the debate on which so much stress had been laid as that those affected by the Bill made no objection to it. But that was not so. They had examined before them Inspectors of police, Government officials of various classes, and resident magistrates of counties, who all agreed that, while it was desirous and right to put down intemperance, the mode proposed was the very worst that could be adopted. But apart from those authorities, he would adduce the evidence of the secretary of the United Trades' Association of Dublin, who might be taken as a fair representative of the working classes. That witness affirmed that there was a very strong feeling among the tradesmen of Dublin against the Bill. They believed it would not promote sobriety, but, on the contrary, introduce private drinking and be productive of great social evil. It had been said that beer was scarcely drunk in Ireland. He did not know what evidence had been given for that assertion, and he most emphatically contradicted the statement. In his own City of Cork the consumption of ale and porter had increased to a very great extent of late years. He denied that whisky was the drink par excellence of the working classes in Ireland; whisky was more consumed by persons of sedentary habits belonging to a different class of society. [Cries of "Divide, divide!"] Well, if hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway thought they should put him down he could only say they were very much mistaken, and if he received any further interruption he would continue speaking until 10 minutes before 6 o'clock. He opposed the Bill: first, because it would not carry out the object proposed; secondly, because it upset the settlement which had been come to in 1872; thirdly, because it was not asked for by those on whose behalf it was proposed to legislate; and, fourthly, because it would do what that House had never done before—namely, confiscate property without giving any compensation whatever.

MR. R. SMYTH said, he was quite satisfied with the discussion which had taken place on the Bill, and as to the suggestion thrown out by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, it was not for him, but the Government, to carry it into effect. When that occurred, he had no doubt it would be found that a very substantial benefit had been conferred upon the people of Ireland. With respect to what had been said by the hon. Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy) about the meeting held in Sligo, and the story he related of the gentleman who took an active part in a temperance meeting held there having that same day finished a bottle of whisky in a railway carriage, he had the best authority for giving it the most direct contradiction. There was not a word of truth in that statement, and there was at that moment a lawsuit pending, which, he had no doubt, would clear up the matter.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY said, he would ask, was it desirable that they should have Sunday closing altogether? The working classes received their wages on Saturday, and it was in his opinion desirable, such were the temptations, that they should have one day's rest; for the charges made at the police courts on Monday morning showed how the Sunday had been passed by many of them. In supporting the Bill, as he was prepared to do so by his vote, he begged it to be understood, should a Bill for England be brought in that Session, that he must hold himself free to take what course he thought proper. It had been shown that this was a perfectly practical measure, and the circumstances connected with it were very similar to those of Scotland. This was a case in which they could not go ahead of public opinion, as an hon. Member asserted. As he understood, Sunday closing was practically observed in Ireland some years ago. [Cries of "Divide!"] Of course, it was, in this matter, in the power of the Government to advance the object which the supporters of the Bill had in view; and they had already proposed to make large concessions, and impose further restrictions in the country towns. He knew not whether, even if they came to a division, the Bill would make much progress this year; but he hoped that next year the concessions made would prove important and beneficial.

MR. WHEELHOUSE, who also spoke amid considerable interruption, said, the question was, whether rightly or wrongly, stated to be an Irish question alone. If he thought it was so, he would not venture upon it; but he apprehended it to be no such thing, and he wished it to be distinctly understood that it was in the power of every Irishman to govern himself in a matter of this kind. Why was it said that the House of Commons should legislate in a matter of this kind, in which men could, if they chose, abstain without any restrictive legislation whatever? Why should a person go into a public-house at all when, if he thought it desirable, he could keep out of it? The House had been told that numerous Bishops and clergymen had signed the Petitions; but what he wanted, if he could, to get at, was the feelings of the class whom this Bill would affect. It was of no use to tell him that large numbers signed the Petitions in favour of the Bill. Let him see who were the parties who signed them. He knew how those Petitions were got up. They were got up in certain offices. He knew how the thing was done. ["Oh, oh!"] He was sorry to say he had reason to be too well acquainted with the system to place any reliance upon such Petitions. They were told that there were men who could not moderate their appetites; but why could they not do so? Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House had a great deal to say about the rights and liberties of the people when certain questions arose that suited them; but when a matter of this kind came before the House, they forgot their advocacy in favour of the liberty of the people. If it was right that the liberty of the people should be pronounced in one matter, why should it not be in another—such, for instance, as the question now before the House? He maintained that class statutes were not the kind of legislation that the people of Ireland wanted. The legislation now proposed was liberty for one and restriction for another. That was as clear as the sun at noonday. It was no argument to say that a number of Bishops and other clergymen had signed the Memorial. He, for one, did not feel moved by such an argument. Some time ago there was in Punch, he believed, a corner picture of a wealthy gentleman—one of those who approved of this movement—and sitting one Sunday afternoon at his ease in his conservatory, he called to his servant to bring him some soda-water and brandy; and, as he consumed it, he exclaimed—"I do not know what the artizans and labouring people want that they have not got." There were, the while, at the opposite corner, a man standing at the door of a public-house with a small jug, and a little girl with a pitcher, waiting for that which they wanted, their Sunday beer. Just see the difference. But the man in the conservatory would exclaim—"I wonder what the working classes want that they have not got." He (Mr. Wheelhouse) would tell the House what the working classes wanted—they wanted to be left alone. They wanted to have the liberty which every man in his situation was entitled to have. That was the question, and he cared not for what might be said to the contrary.

MR. SPEAKER interposed, stating that, according to the Standing Orders of the House, this debate stands adjourned till to-morrow.

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS— THE BUDGET RESOLUTIONS. QUESTION.

MR. LOWE inquired what the intentions of the Government were with regard to the Budget Resolutions?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in reply, said, that the Budget Resolutions could not be taken to-morrow; but that as soon as the Government saw their way through the Peace Preservation Bill, they would make a statement on the subject.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD ACT, 1872—COSTS OF PROSECUTIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. GRANTHAM (for Mr. MEREWETHER) asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to the case of a grocer at Daventry, convicted for selling coffee adulterated with acorns to the extent of 50 per cent., upon the certificate of the analyst of an adjoining county; and whether, after notice of appeal given, the magistrates have received an admission from the analyst that there was no adulteration whatever; also to a similar case at Thrapston, in which the police withdrew from the prosecution, it being proved that, notwithstanding a certificate of the same analyst to the same effect, there was no percentage of adulteration at all; and, whether the costs of appeal in the first case, and £20 8s. the amount ordered to be paid to the defendant as costs in the second case, must be defrayed out of the county rate?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH: Sir, my attention has been called both to the Daventry and Thrapston case, and the facts are as stated in the Question of my hon. and learned Friend. In both cases the costs will fall on the county rate, assuming always that the officer conducting the prosecution was the proper officer for that purpose. In case of the appeal to the quarter sessions, however, it will be within the discretion of the Court to award costs or otherwise as they may think proper.

ARMY MEDICAL SERVICE.

QUESTION.

MR. GIBSON asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is the fact that Officers of the Army Medical Service, when first attached to a regiment, although not permitted to wear its uniform or to describe themselves as belonging to it, are compelled to pay fifty days' pay as contribution to its mess and band funds; and, whether it is his intention to take any steps to remedy such a state of facts, if they exist?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that medical officers, when attached to regiments for five years, became, in fact, bond fide officers of the regiment, and paid just as the other officers did. They paid the following contributions in monthly instalments extending over a period of 10 months—not exceeding 30 days' pay (the sum being fixed by the commanding officer) for the mess, and for the band 20 days' pay. He might remark that under the present system the five years of service was not confined to medical officers, but extended to officers of all ranks. He did not think the fact of the Army medical officers having to contribute to these funds was a hardship, calling for interference by the War Office.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION ACT—THE LONDON SCHOOL BOARD—CASE OF
MRS. MARKS.—QUESTION.

LORD ESLINGTON asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether his attention has been called to a reported tyrannical exercise of authority in the case of a Mrs. Marks, by an officer of the London School Board, in an attempt to compel the attendance at school of her eldest girl, aged eleven years, having charge of two infant children; and, whether the case, as reported, is true; and, if true, whether he can inform Parliament that steps have been taken by the Board to prevent the recurrence of similar acts of tyranny?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, the Education Department has no authority to interfere with the discretion of the school boards respecting the manner in which they exercise the powers conferred upon them by the Act of 1870, of compelling the attendance of children at school, when once the bye-laws have been sanctioned by the Committee of the Privy Council. Sir Charles Reed, the Chairman of the London School Board, has, however, been so good as to forward to me a letter from one of the members of the Board in whose division the case occurred, showing that the matter was immediately investigated, and explaining the circumstances. As far as my present information goes, drawn from this source and from the letters which have appeared in The Times, I cannot see that there was any tyrannical exercise of authority on the part of the officer respecting Mrs. Marks, who was, at the time, in receipt of out-door relief. I would remind my noble Friend that, by the bye-laws of the School Board, all children beneficially and necessarily at work above 10 and under 13 years of age are obliged to attend school for 10 hours a-week, and not more; and that by the Act of 1873, passed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), the guardians are bound to make it a condition of continuous relief out of the House, that all children between five and 13 years of age attend school, unless they have passed a certain Standard, granting such additional relief—if any—as may be necessary for that purpose. In this case both bye-laws and Act were broken; and to show the extreme difficulty of making exceptions as to their enforcement, I may mention that a woman living near Mrs. Marks complained to the visitor of her children being compelled to go to school while some of Mrs. Marks's children were let off. The provision for the very serious money difficulties of these cases, beyond the school fees, rests with the guardians; but the School Board and their officers are bound to see that the law is obeyed. I have always expressed my opinion that great delicacy and consideration are needed in working the bye-laws for compelling attendance at school—and when you deal with the very poor, the class for whom the Education Act was specially needed, whose heroic efforts in many cases to keep themselves from pauperism no one who knows them can praise too highly, it is impossible not to be grieved to think of the distress and privation which, for the time, they must undergo under the Education Act, however confident we may feel that in the end it will be for their own and their children's benefit and for the advantage of the community. I am glad to have this opportunity of saying that I have no hesitation in affirming that, as far as I can ascertain, these compulsory powers have, as a rule, been used by the London and the other school boards with remarkable judgment, care, and discretion. Unless, therefore, Parliament wishes to reverse its legislation respecting compulsory attendance, I venture to express an earnest hope that hon. Members in Parliament, and also magistrates on the Bench, will support the school boards and boards of guardians in the exercise of this most irksome, most difficult, and most laborious part of the duties which the Legislature has committed to their charge—namely, that of compelling the attendance at school of the unwilling children of unwilling parents.

LORD ESLINGTON said, he would, at the earliest opportunity, call the attention of the House to the case, because he believed it to be a specimen case.

INDIA—THE FACTORY SYSTEM.

QUESTION.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If he will inform the House what steps the Indian Government has taken for inquiry or for legislation regarding factories in India?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, we received a short time back a despatch from the Bombay Government, informing us that they had appointed a Commission, composed of Europeans and Natives, to inquire into and report upon the factory system in force in that Presidency.

AGRICULTURAL CHILDREN ACT.

QUESTION.

MR. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, Whether he has considered the letter of "An Eastern Counties Farmer," in "The Times" of April 30, in which he complains that no steps are taken to enforce the provisions of the Agricultural Children Act, and states that, wishing to obey the Law, he refuses to employ those of his labourers' children whose employment would be contrary to the Act; but that his neighbours, finding that "there is nobody to see the Law carried out," do employ their labourers' young children, and that his own labourers declare that they will leave his service "to work for some farmer who will break the Law and employ their children;" and, further, that his best men have already left him for this cause, and that he will be compelled to yield; and, whether, considering the inequality with which it appears that the Act presses upon those who obey and those who systematically ignore it, he will take the necessary measures to secure obedience to the Law?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, I have read the letter of "An Eastern Counties Farmer" in The Times on the subject of the Agricultural Children Act, and I consider that such statements from practical men of the working of the present law are very useful, and will assist us to arrive at a satisfactory mode of treatment of this grave matter. From various quarters we are receiving unofficially more and more information, and I gather that, while in some parts of the country the Act is at present practically inoperative, in others it has been really effective, and my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) has recently assured me that in his county, where the magistrates in quarter session determined to enforce the Act by means of the police, the law may be considered to be almost universally obeyed. I must remind my hon. Friend that the weak point of the Act—the absence of an enforcing authority—was patent to everyone in the House when this Bill was passed; but owing, I imagine, to the difficulty of fixing upon a satisfactory authority, the House, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), who was then responsible for the conduct of all educational legislation, determined that the experiment should be made without an enforcing authority. The Act has only been fully in operation for about four months, and it is the decided opinion of Her Majesty's Government that a wise solution of this difficult question is much more likely to be obtained after a year's experience of the working of the new law than by hasty and premature amendment of it. To enable the Government to form an opinion of the various ways in which the Act has been worked in every part of the country and of how it has operated, our information being at present very partial, full Reports will be received from Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools at the end of the year, and my right hon. Friend the

Mr. Kay-Shuttleworth

Secretary of State for the Home Department has requested the opinion of magistrates in quarter sessions upon it. I shall avail myself of every other source of information which is available respecting this important subject.

IMPORTATION OF CATTLE—ILL-TREATMENT IN TRANSIT. QUESTION.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether his attention has been called to the second letter in "The Times" of Monday the 3rd inst., and signed by Captain Sloane Stanley, repeating and adding to his former statements respecting the brutal ill-treatment of cattle on board a vessel from Antwerp to Deptford, and especially on their being landed at Deptford; and, whether the Government will make further inquiries on this subject, and lay upon the Table of this House a Copy of any Report they may receive from their Inspectors, as to the conflicting statements made on this matter?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, our attention has been called to both the letters of Captain Sloane Stanley to The Times, on the supposed ill-treatment of cattle on board a vessel from Antwerp to Deptford. As soon as the first letter appeared full inquiries were directed to be made into the circumstances by one of the Inspectors of the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council, and a letter was also addressed by the Lord President's orders to the Secretary of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, asking for any information he might possess respecting the case. As much interest is felt in this matter, I propose to lay upon the Table of the House immediately the Report of the Inspector upon this matter, together with the letter from Mr. Colam, the able Secretary of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and I think the House will then see that all the inquiries have been made which are possible in this case. I need hardly assure my hon. Friend that the Lord President and myself are most anxious to do all in our power to prevent all unnecessary suffering to animals, a matter respecting which the public mind is happily very susceptible.

RIVERS POLLUTION COMMISSIONERS.
QUESTION.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether his predecessor in 1872 received replies from some eminent chemists, including Baron Liebig, Mons. Dumas, Dr. Hoffmann, Sir Benjamin Brodie, Dr. Williamson, Dr. Odling, and others, to the following (abbreviated) Questions put by the Rivers Pollution Commissioners, viz.:—1. Is it desirable in the interest both of manufacturers and the public that a definition of standards of polluting liquids should be fixed by Parliament; 2. Are the standards recommended by the Commissioners fair and reasonable; and, whether he has any objection to lay their letters before Parliament previous to this House being asked to consider the Rivers Pollution Bill?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, that the replies referred to in the right hon. Gentleman's Question had been addressed to his Predecessor in office, and the most important of them—namely, those of Baron von Liebig and M. Dumas—would be found in the fourth part of the Fourth Report of the Rivers Pollution Commissioners. With regard to the Reports in continuation laid on the Table of the House, but not yet distributed, he had to state that the last revise would be in the hands of the printers within a few days, and he hoped they would soon afterwards be in the hands of hon. Members.

NAVY—H.M. YACHT "OSBORNE."
QUESTION.

CAPTAIN PIM asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether, when Her Majesty's ship "Osborne," the yacht of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, was docked at Portsmouth on Monday last, it was discovered that a number of the sheets of copper had disappeared from her bottom; whether those sheets of copper had been nailed on with nails of a new description called "phosphor bronze," not quite six months ago; whether any others, and, if so, which others, of Her Majesty's ships have been similarly coppered, who invented this "phosphor bronze," and whether any gratuity has been awarded to the inventor; and, if so, what amount of gratuity; and, whether any steps will be promptly taken to place officers in command of any of Her Majesty's ships in which these "phosphor bronze" nails had been used on their guard against the danger to which their ships would be exposed through defects caused by the use of those nails?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that when Her Majesty's yacht Osborne was docked it was found that there were several sheets of copper off her. The copper had been fastened with a new description of nail recommended by a Committee of Admiralty officers as an experiment designed to check the occasional rapid local corrosion of the sheets of copper. The material was not "phosphor bronze." There had been no payment made on account of it as a gratuity to inventors. Several vessels had been wholly or partially sheathed with this description of nail when the failure of the nails became apparent, and orders were given in September last that all such vessels should be docked at the earliest opportunity, and that the sheathing should be re-nailed.

THE TICHBORNE TRIAL—CONTEMPT OF COURT—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the numerous Petitions praying for inquiry as to the administration of the law as to Contempt of Court in the proceedings of the Tichborne Trial, Whether it is his intention to institute any inquiry relating thereto, or to take any steps for the protection of the public against new and arbitrary penalties under the name of Contempt of Court?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it was not the intention of the Government to take any steps in reference to the subject referred to.

MR. WHALLEY gave Notice that he would call attention to the subject on going into Committee of Supply.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.

THE ADJOURNED DEBATE ON PUBLICATION OF DEBATES AND EXCLUSION OF STRANGERS.—QUESTIONS.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I believe it will be for the convenience of the House, If the Prime Minister is able to state whether he can make arrangements for the resumption of the debate on the Publication of the Debates and the Exclusion of Strangers earlier than the time now fixed? I would also take this opportunity of asking the right hon. Gentleman, When it is his intention to take the debate upon the Budget Resolutions?

MR. DISRAELI: I very much regret, Sir, that the debate should have terminated so unexpectedly and unsatisfactorily on Tuesday night, and that no conclusion was arrived at on the subject of the Resolutions which were then before the House. There certainly was an understanding—at least, on this side of the House, and I think a general understanding—that until the debate was concluded and the opinion of the House on the points in reference to Privilege which it involved had been taken, no hon. Member would avail himself of his individual privilege of “espying strangers.” I beg to state most distinctly that I charge the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) with no malâ fide in the matter. From what I have seen of that hon. Gentleman and of his conduct in this House, I am quite sure he is totally incapable of taking such a step. But the hon. Member, who is of a disposition somewhat impetuous and excitable, arrived at a conclusion which, with a little more Parliamentary experience, he would find was not warranted. Now, Sir, the Motion of the noble Lord consisted of a series of Resolutions, and the opinion of the House was asked upon the first. Those who were interested in the matter might have spoken generally upon those Resolutions; but it is quite impossible that, after so short a debate and no vote having been taken upon the first Resolution, the subject could be considered as exhausted, or the opinion of the House expressed upon a matter which is, probably, more complicated than some hon. Gentlemen seem to imagine. I remember when I was first asked to conduct the Business of the House nearly a quarter of a century ago, I declined on the ground that I had never been in an official position, and, therefore, did not feel myself equal to the discharge of its duties. I afterwards consulted the late Lord Lyndhurst upon the matter, and he told me that, although it was a fact that, with the exception of my own case, there was only one in the history of the country in which an offer of the Leadership of the House had been made to a Member who had had no previous official experience whatever, he still advised me to accept the office. “But,” he said, “there is one thing I would impress upon you. Do not let anything induce you to define in writing the unwritten law of Parliament. If you refrain from doing that,” he said, “you will keep out of many difficulties; but if you once attempt it you will, as manager of the House, find yourself in inextricable confusion.” I confess that the opinion of such a man—perhaps one of the most sagacious of this century—had great influence with me; and although I am not myself unprepared, under certain circumstance, to refuse to yield to it, I am still of opinion that it requires on the part of the House the utmost caution before they can arrive at any satisfactory solution of a subject so difficult as that to which I have referred, although some hon. Gentlemen think it so easy to do so, and for this reason—that in dealing with one part of the unwritten law of Parliament you are making precedents for dealing with other parts which are absolutely necessary for the defence of the rights of the minority and of the liberties of England. I should, therefore, have been glad if the debate had come to a conclusion on Tuesday night. I think we might have arrived at some solution, if only of a temporary character, which would have allowed the House gravely and completely to consider the question. I am not going to conclude with a Motion, because I believe that, under such circumstances as the present, it is not unusual for the House to extend its indulgence to one in my position when speaking of the conduct of Public Business and of circumstances connected with that Public Business. But there can be no doubt that the unfortunate interposition of the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) prevented that debate from being concluded, and that there is no immediate prospect of its being resumed. I admit that it is impossible, after what has occurred, to leave matters, even for a very short time, as they are; and, therefore, I am going to put a Notice on the Table of the House which I will move to-morrow if I have an opportunity of doing so, to the following effect:—

“ That if, at any sitting of the House, or in Committee, any Member shall take notice that strangers are present, the Speaker, or the Chairman (as the case may be) shall forthwith put the question that strangers be ordered to withdraw, without permitting any debate or amendment.”

I wish, Sir, now to make a few observations upon the state of the Business of the House, with regard to what has occurred and what might occur, and what prospects we have in this Session of dealing with the Bills before the House. Charges have been made against the Government—it is easy to make charges—as to its management of the Public Business and the wasting of so much time upon Privilege debates, which it is said have caused such an obstruction to the conduct of business and the prosecution of Government measures. Now, the fact is that the Privilege debates have not wasted an hour of the public time so far, and they have been no obstruction to the prosecution of Government measures. I have been furnished with an abstract of what has been done, and what I find is this. The House met on the 5th of February. Including Morning Sittings, there have been 26 Government days since that date. Two days in the first week were occupied in bringing in Bills, four since with the Regimental Exchanges Bill, nine with the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill, four with the Artizans Dwellings Bill, three with Supply, and one each with the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Bill, the Friendly Societies Bill, and the Budget. Therefore, in fact, the Privilege debates have not interfered with the conduct of the Public Business. What has interfered, and what is likely to interfere with the conduct of the Public Business, is a question which I wish to bring under the consideration of the House in order that we may have clear ideas in reference to it. The great obstacle to the prosecution of the Government business has been the opposition which has been offered to the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill. But in mentioning that fact, which is shown by the table I have just read to the House, from which it appears that nine days have been occupied by that opposition, I wish it to be clearly understood that I make no charge whatever against any hon. Members for having offered that opposition to the Bill. They were in their Parliamentary right in taking the course they have done with regard to it. It has been said that some hon. Members have used that right excessively; but I do not bring such a charge against them. I believe that, on the whole, taking into consideration the fact that they were determined to offer an unflinching opposition to the Bill, they have not exceeded their Parliamentary right, although I cannot help regretting that, in opposing that measure, they did not take into consideration the fact that the Bill was a modified one, drawn in a conciliatory spirit. But, while I admit the full Parliamentary right of those hon. Members to oppose that Bill, I hope they will not deny the full Parliamentary right of myself and my Colleagues to pass it, and I may state that to pass that Bill is our intention, and that we shall not relax our efforts until we have accomplished that object. Do not, however, let the House suppose that there has been any mismanagement on this question which has retarded the prosecution and the progress of any measure of great importance to the welfare of the country. It has been alleged that it is owing to the want of firmness on the part of the Government that this opposition—which I admit to be constitutional and Parliamentary—to the Peace Preservation Bill has been protracted. I can only say in reply that I have offered to that opposition an unbroken front, and I must take this opportunity of thanking my hon. Friends around me for their constant attendance, and for the gallant manner in which they have supported Her Majesty's Government throughout. It should be remembered that there is nothing unusual in a Peace Preservation Bill for Ireland being opposed in this manner. I will not advert to the discussion that may have occurred on an Arms Act at a time when the House of Commons was broken into fierce parties, and when factious manoeuvres were resorted to; but I will take a period which is often referred to, as one when the conduct of Public Business was such as maintained the high character of the House. I will take the year 1843, when Sir Robert Peel was at the height of his power and prosperity, and when his policy was not questioned by any one in this House except with regard to the passing of a Peace Preservation Bill, and when even as regard its majority his Government was more powerful than that of the Ministers who now sit on these benches. Let me show what occurred at that time with regard to a measure almost identical with the present. On the 28th of April, 1843, leave was given to bring in an Arms Bill, not so complicated in its character as the present. On the 26th of May Lord Clements made a Motion against the Bill. The second reading of the Bill came on on the 29th of May, and the discussion upon it occupied three days. Our difficulties in connection with the present Bill have been much greater.

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman is now entering into matters of argument and he is therefore out of Order.

MR. DISRAELI: It is not my intention to offer any argument on the subject at the present moment. I will confine myself to stating facts, and if the House desires that I should do so I will conclude with a Motion. I was about to show that the Bill went into Committee on the 15th of June, and that it was in Committee for nine days. The Report was brought up on the 24th of July, and it was not agreed to until the 27th of July. The third reading took place on the 9th of August. The House will, therefore, see that what has occurred in the present instance is not unusual in Parliament with regard to Peace Preservation Acts for Ireland, and that it is totally out of the power of any Minister to restrict fair discussion upon such a question. I will say no more upon that point; but perhaps the House would wish me to make some statement as to the measures which are now upon the Table, and the progress of which has been arrested by the opposition which has been offered to the Peace Preservation Bill. There are a great many measures which the Government have introduced, either in the House of Lords or House of Commons, and the principle of which has been approved by their having been read a second time. We believe it is of the highest importance to the country that these measures should be carried. I have ascertained, so far as I can do so by investigation, and by those estimates which one makes on paper, the manner in which the time of the House will be disposed of during the next three months, and it appears to me that all these measures may be carried—if there be only fair opposition to be encountered—and that the Business of the House may be virtually closed by the end of July. At the same time, however, I think it but fair to say that, from a sense of duty, it is the determination of Her Majesty's Government to carry all those measures, and that we shall adhere to that resolution, even if we feel it our duty to advise Her Majesty not to prorogue Parliament until these measures have received the Royal sanction. I beg to move that this House do now adjourn. Being on my legs I ought to give Notice that it is our intention to proceed with the Budget Resolutions to-morrow morning.

Motion made, and Question proposed.
 "That this House do now adjourn."—
 (Mr. Disraeli.)

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I do not intend to avail myself of the opportunity offered by the Motion with which the right hon. Gentleman has concluded to follow him through the statement which he has thought it necessary to make on the subject of questions of Privilege of the House, and also on that of the state of Public Business. But I should like to take the opportunity of asking the right hon. Gentleman one further question, and to premise that question by a very short statement. The House will recollect that the immediate cause or origin of the question of Privilege with which it has been called on to deal was a Motion made by the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis) with respect to the publication of certain proceedings of a Committee upstairs. After a not very satisfactory discussion upon that subject the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Sullivan) asked the right hon. Gentleman whether it was his intention to make to the House any proposals on the subject of the relation between this House and the Press arising out of the publication of our debates; and the right hon. Gentleman having stated that such was not his intention, the hon. Member for Louth said he would avail himself of another privilege of Members of this House in order to force upon the attention of the House and of the Government what he considered to be an unsatisfactory condition of affairs with reference to the publication of our debates. The Motion which the right hon. Gentleman intends to make with regard to the exclusion of Strangers may be—and I am not prepared to say it is not—a satisfactory settlement of this question; but I think it will not be satisfactory to a majority of the House that this question should be officially disposed of without the House having an opportunity of fully considering that other question which led in the first instance to this particular exercise of Privilege. The question, therefore, which I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman is, whether he will undertake that within some reasonable time—I do not ask for an early day—an opportunity shall be given for the resumption of the adjourned debate on the first Resolution which I moved, in order that the opinion of the House may be taken upon the relations that exist between the Press and the House with regard to the publication of the debates. In fact, the point might arise whether that Resolution being now upon the Table of the House it would be competent for the right hon. Gentleman to move another affecting the exclusion of Strangers until the Order of the Day for the discussion of my Resolution has been discharged or determined upon by the House. At all events, the House will feel that this question of the rule bearing upon the publication of our debates should be settled. Of course, it is impossible for me as a private Member to secure any opportunity for the renewal of the debate on my Resolution without the assistance of the Government. I have no observations to make in reference to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as to the position of Public Business, except that it appears to me a somewhat unusual and inconvenient course that the right hon. Gentleman should take the opportunity afforded him on a Motion for the adjournment of the House of answering, so far as I can understand, an article which appeared in The Times of yesterday. I am not aware that any imputation has been thrown upon Her Majesty's Government in this House for the length to which the discussion upon the Peace Preservation Act has been carried; but I have observed that certain observations to that effect have been made in the leading journal to which I have referred. I do not think that this is a convenient time for the discussion of that question, and I merely wish to observe that the right hon. Gentleman has, both on this and on former occasions, told the House that he is a stickler for preserving the precedents of the House, and to ask whether there is any precedent for the course he proposes to take of dealing with the Budget Resolutions at a Morning Sitting? I cannot help thinking that if persisted in there would be very considerable inconvenience in taking an important discussion of that character at a Morning Sitting. If the state of Public Business is such that it cannot be conducted without an interference with the privileges of private Members, I would submit to the right hon. Gentleman that it would be more convenient if he would ask for to-morrow evening instead of to-morrow morning. We all know what is the position of hon. Members who have Motions down on the Paper for Friday if the House has a Morning Sitting and has to re-assemble at 9 o'clock; and I feel sure the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) would just as soon give up his right to bring forward his Motion at all as that it should be interfered with by the Budget Resolutions being taken at 2 o'clock to-morrow afternoon. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government has made a very strong statement with regard to the intentions of the Government, to carry all the measures which they have placed upon the Table of the House. I had imagined that that was a matter which rested rather with the House than with the right hon. Gentleman. But I am sure that several hon. Members, who have thought that there has been some want of energy on the part of the right hon. Gentleman in conducting the affairs of the Government in this House up to the present time, will certainly have no cause to complain of that in the future.

MR. DISRAELI: With respect to the remarks of the noble Lord, I may say that in regard to the Budget it would, of course, be more agreeable to us that it should come on on Friday evening. That evening, however, is appropriated to hon. Members over whom I have no influence, but whom the noble Lord is in a position to advise. If the course of Business can be so arranged that the Budget discussion shall come on in the evening, and not in the afternoon, the wish of the Government will be fully met. [Mr. GLADSTONE: But we ought to know definitely.] So far as we can say at present it must be taken at a Morning Sitting. With regard to the debate on the Motion of the noble Lord, I must confess that—feeling I was intruding rather on the attention of the House—I did not sufficiently notice that point. I think the 25th—the day which I first mentioned to the noble Lord—would be a very convenient day for the resumption of the discussion, and I believe no difficulty would stand in the way. If it be not practicable to obtain that day, I shall certainly feel bound to use my utmost endeavours to secure to the noble Lord the continuance of a debate which I myself believe would be highly advantageous to the House.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am bound to say that in the course of the many years since I first entered Parliament I have rarely listened to a statement from the Leader of the House with greater regret than I have just done to the statement we have now heard from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. As my noble Friend has just observed, besides the unwritten law of Parliament, there are precedents of Parliament; and there is one precedent—one rule—which above all is important, and that is that due respect should be paid by the Ministers of the Crown, and by the Leaders of the House, to the liberties of hon. Members. I never within my recollection heard an approximation even to the statement we have just heard from the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. I am sorry to feel it incumbent upon me to take notice of it; but the right hon. Gentleman states that the Government have introduced a number of measures, and he did not even condescend to specify what those measures were. Speaking of them in the gross and wholesale, he told the House that if they thought fit to confine themselves to what he considered the proper limits of time for discussion, Parliament might be prorogued in July. He nevertheless failed to specify any one of that mass and bundle of measures which he said it was the intention of the Government to carry, and with respect to which he stated that he must keep the House sitting until all those measures were disposed of. Now, Sir, in no heat of language or use of epithets, but in all seriousness and earnestness, I would appeal not less to Gentlemen on that side than to Gentlemen on this side of the House to know whether this is a becoming tone and method of proceeding on the part of the First Minister of the Crown. I do not wish to use any epithet beyond this; but I do feel it necessary to follow my noble Friend in entering his protest against such a cause; and I claim for my own liberty to say, that if such a tone should be again adopted, even by a person holding the high station of the First Minister of the Crown, I will reserve to myself the right to take such steps as I may see cause for. I have a word or two to say with respect to the Budget. I own it is with great surprise that I hear the right hon. Gentleman state on a Thursday afternoon “it is our intention to proceed with the Budget to-morrow at 2 o’clock.” Well, Sir, in the first place, as has been stated by my noble Friend, it is entirely without precedent to bring forward the Budget—the principal discussion of the Budget and its general character and features—at a Morning Sitting, and this for the most obvious reasons. It is upon that subject, more even than upon any other, that we desire the advantage of the presence of those amongst our Members who have experience in finance, and whose necessary business requires their presence in the City at that hour. I must, therefore, say that if, under very great pressure, the right hon. Gentleman had thought fit to make an appeal to the House, and to say that, if no objection was taken, he wished, under the circumstances, with regard to Private Business, the Budget should be taken at 2 o’clock, that undoubtedly would have been the way to secure favourable acceptance of the proposal, though possibly not without serious inconvenience. But I must say that it is most objectionable at this short Notice, in defiance of all precedent, to announce positively, on the part of the Government, and not on the part of the House—no Morning Sitting having, so far as I am aware, been appointed for to-morrow—that the Government would proceed at 2 o’clock with that Business, in total disregard, apparently, of the convenience or inconvenience of those Gentlemen to whose usual and necessary detention in the City I have already adverted. With reference to the Budget I am sorry to say for myself that it will be necessary for me to make observations—perhaps rather more detailed observations than I should wish—upon many points that have been raised on the Financial Statement for the year. As far as I am concerned, I will make no difficulty whatever; but, at the same time, I own that if the meeting is to be held, and for that purpose, I should have acceded to the proposal with infinitely greater satisfaction had the right hon. Gentleman, in the tone he used and the language he adopted, been a little more considerate with regard to the Rules of the House, and with regard to the convenience of Members, as well as the right and title of the House to fix the time and method of its own proceedings.

MR. DISRAELI: When I mentioned a Morning Sitting I was of opinion that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had sounded the feeling of right hon. Gentlemen opposite in this matter. Otherwise, I should not so rudely have announced the intention of the Government with respect to bringing forward the Budget at a Morning Sitting to-morrow. I see the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) in his place, and if he would make an arrangement so as not to bring forward his Motion to-morrow night, we could then take the Budget. But we are in the hands of the hon. Gentleman.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I should not dream of standing in the way of the House with regard to bringing forward the Budget Resolutions to-morrow night. I would, however, ask, not on my own behalf, but in the interests of private Members generally, that some means should be afforded them for bringing forward the Motions which stand in their names, and for this reason—that hon. Members having given way before without a definite promise from the Government have been disappointed in not finding another opportunity of submitting their propositions. On a recent occasion the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government made an appeal to the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho) not to bring forward a Motion which he had on the Paper. Ultimately it happened that the noble Lord did not give way, whilst the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. O. Lewis) and myself did give way, without asking for a day, and I think in the circumstances it is better that I should ask for a day on this occasion.

MR. DISRAELI: If the hon. Baronet will communicate with me I will endeavour to make a satisfactory arrangement.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I confess that I have heard the statement of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government with some disappointment. I was the first Member of the House this Session to call attention to the confusion of matters in the Order Book with reference to the opportunities afforded to non-official Members for bringing on their Motions. It appears to me that there was ample reason for the appointment of a Committee to consider the questions which have arisen with respect to the state of Public Business and the Privileges of non-official Members of the House. I had entertained the hope that some such Committee would be suggested or sanctioned by the First Minister of the Crown; but, on the contrary, the right hon. Gentleman has clearly informed us that, so far as he is concerned, he will do nothing towards remedying that confusion to which I have alluded, and he has announced his intention of taking Government measures from day to day, claiming to himself the power obtained under the Resolutions of 1869 of appointing Morning Sittings, and thus aggravating the difficulties which we all feel in regard to bringing forward any Motions we may desire to submit to the consideration of the House. With regard to what fell from the right hon. Gentleman as to the position of the Irish Coercion Bill, I think the precedent the right hon. Gentleman cited—that of the Arms Act of 1844—was a very unfortunate one. It is the first instance I remember of the gross abuse of debate in Committee, by debates not on details, but repeated debates on principle. I little expected to hear the First Minister of the Crown applaud such a transgression of the rules of legitimate debate. I am sorry to say that the practice of opposition in Committee has been sanctioned by the conduct of the Conservative Party during the last Parliament. I lamented that circumstance at the time, and I lament it now; because it is the means by which, more than by any other, the debates of this House become unduly protracted. It is now almost impossible to prevent repeated allusions to the principle of a Bill in Committee—a thing which is contrary to the former and better custom of this House. No one can doubt that these repetitions and irrelevancies tend to degrade the debates of this great Assembly and to lower their standard.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I do not know that it is quite understood on this side of the House whether the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government intends to make his Motion to-morrow respecting the exclusion of Strangers.

MR. DISRAELI: I should like to put my Motion on the Paper; but as the Budget is fixed for to-morrow, it may be more convenient to take that Motion on another day.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

BOSTON ELECTION.

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS.

Answer to Address reported, as follows:—

"I have received the joint Address of the two Houses of Parliament in reference to the Report made by the Judge selected to try a Petition in respect of the Election and Return for the Borough of Boston; and I have given directions accordingly for the appointment of the Gentlemen named in the Address to be Commissioners for the purpose of making the Inquiry prayed for."

THE QUEEN v. CASTRO—THE TRIAL AT BAR—THE DEBATE OF APRIL 23.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. WHALLEY: I have wished, Sir, to make a personal explanation, in accordance with a Notice I gave on a previous day. I have, however, deferred mention of the subject until the right hon. Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) should be in his place and have an opportunity of replying; but I have received from the right hon. Baronet a letter, by which I presume he is not present. [Sir ROBERT PEEL here entered the House.] I am very happy to see the right hon. Gentleman in his place, and therefore I need not read the letter, the receipt of which led me to suppose he would not be here.

Mr. Newdegate

It will be in the recollection of the House that, in the course of the debate which took place on the 23rd of April, the hon. Member for Stoke read a paper in the form of a memorandum, said to have been left behind him by the person whom I may refer to, with the permission of the House, as the Claimant, stating substantially that he had been told by me that the right hon. Baronet had informed me that Sir Alexander Cockburn had told him that the Claimant would be convicted and sentenced to 15 years' penal servitude. The right hon. Baronet was not in his place on that occasion; but on the following Monday he rose, as I rise now, and said that there was 'not, in that statement, the shadow of a shade of truth, making use of other expressions of that kind; and going especially into the features of the memorandum, it appeared to the right hon. Baronet a palpable absurdity that a person in the position of the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench should have penned such a communication to him as he was represented to have made. I beg leave to say that I greatly sympathized with the right hon. Baronet in what he said on that occasion, as to being dragged before the House on such a subject; and also, to a certain extent, I sympathized with the right hon. Gentleman in what he said with regard to the hon. Member for Stoke reading the memorandum, and with respect to any question of veracity—though I should hardly call it that—between the right hon. Baronet and myself. I shall speak with the utmost possible reservation, or mitigation, as to my own recollection on any point which comes into collision with the recollection of the right hon. Baronet. With respect to the memorandum, I am sure that the right hon. Baronet will, at any rate, give me credit for having stated only what I believed to be true. What I stated to the Claimant was what I believed the right hon. Baronet to have said—and I take the liberty to say that my recollection still holds good that it was what the right hon. Baronet said—and, in justice to the unhappy man in prison, he has, to the best of my recollection, also accurately recorded in the memorandum what was read by the hon. Member for Stoke. With regard to the "palpable absurdity" of the statement, I would recall to the recollection of the right hon. Baronet this circumstance, that the communication was made by him to me—not in a casual conversation merely, not in a mere gossiping tone, but in a formal appeal to me for information on the subject; that I did myself suggest to him how exceedingly improbable it was that the right hon. Baronet should have been mistaken in what he repeated to me as the statement of the Lord Chief Justice. But, as I have said, I desire to keep my recollection in subjection to the right hon. Baronet's recollection in the matter—and I hope he will not forget that when I heard of the intention of the hon. Member for Stoke to make public that memorandum, I took the first opportunity of writing to the right hon. Baronet expressing my regret that his name should thus be brought before the public, and stating that it was not at all with my consent, but in fact, so far as I could make any protest to the hon. Member for Stoke, that it was against my protest that that was to be done. I certainly did understand that the right hon. Baronet accepted my explanation in the spirit in which I gave it; and I think he will exonerate me from all further responsibility in the matter. I have no doubt whatever, if the opportunity were offered for further discussion between the right hon. Baronet and myself, and if the House were to grant the inquiry which it has so emphatically refused, then all differences as to recollection between him and myself would be reconciled. Rather than impute anything to the right hon. Baronet or bring myself into collision with him, I would plead some deficiency of recollection on my part; but what I would say is that it was not at the time “palpably absurd” that the Lord Chief Justice should make such a communication to the right hon. Baronet. It was not absurd then, because it was only a few weeks before that unhappy man, the Claimant—

[“Order, order!”]

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that he is going beyond the bounds of personal explanation.

MR. WHALLEY: I hope that what I am about to say will be more agreeable to the House than the point I have just referred to. What I am about to say raises the question of the accuracy of statements which have passed between two or three Members of the House. I quite concurred in the remark which has been made as to the unmannerly proceeding of hon. Members, directly or indirectly, allowing private conversation to be repeated and made use of for public purposes; and if the House considers that I have erred in this matter, and that I was not justified in repeating what I had heard to the Claimant, I will at once throw myself on the indulgence of the House. Recognizing the force of the observations to which I have just adverted, I will merely say that the communication in question was not made to me in a gossiping form at all, but in a tone of—[“Order, order!”]

MR. SPEAKER: I have to suggest to the hon. Member that he is drawing too much on the indulgence of the House in repeating observations which he has made more than once.

MR. WHALLEY: I think I have entered upon a topic which, if I could be permitted to exhaust it, would raise this personal question into one of public importance. Therefore, I shall beg leave to conclude with a Motion, for it seems to me that nothing could be more important than the question raised by the remark as to the use that should not be made of casual conversations, and I hope the House will be pleased to listen to a statement of the circumstances. [“No, no!”] I defer at once to the feeling manifested by the House on that subject. In conclusion, I can only say that I now certify to the accuracy of the memorandum as containing to the best of my recollection that which the right hon. Baronet stated to me, and which I conveyed to the Claimant.

SIR ROBERT PEEL: I wish, Sir, to say only one word with respect to the statement of the hon. Member for Peterborough. In common with the House, I have listened with great satisfaction to the statement just made; for, as far as I could gather from it, the hon. Member has completely exonerated me from having said what there is no doubt that he incorrectly reported to the person to whom he alludes as the Claimant. The hon. Gentleman has distinctly stated in the hearing of the House that he subjected his recollection and his opinion in this matter entirely to mine. I can only assure the hon. Member, as I assured him in the letter to which he has referred, that I did not and could not have said what I was reported in the Orton Diary to have said, and which the hon. Member for Stoke brought before the notice of the House. What does the thing really amount to? Why, that the Claimant told his counsel, Dr. Kenealy — [Mr. WHALLEY: No, no!] — I am only stating what the charge was. It was that the Claimant told his counsel that he, the Claimant, had heard from Mr. Whalley, who had heard from Sir Robert Peel, who had heard from the Lord Chief Justice, who had been informed by the other Judges, that before the jury had decided in a criminal case which they were trying, they, the Judges, had come to the determination to convict the prisoner! That statement bore its own refutation. I am glad the hon. Gentleman has given me the opportunity of confirming the subjection in which he has placed his own views to mine, and I assure him that he must have been mistaken; and I have nothing to retract from or to add to the statement which the House, with its usual courtesy and kindness, permitted me to make the other evening.

BILL—[BILL 77.]

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, The Solicitor General for Ireland.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 4th May.]

Bill considered in Committee.

Clause 5 (Continuance of certain parts of Protection of Life and Property in certain Parts of Ireland Act.)

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU proposed to leave out the clause, which re-enacted the Westmeath Act. He contended that as this Bill applied to the whole of Ireland it was unnecessary to have a special Act for three of the counties, placing them on a different footing from the rest of Ireland. The powers given under the clauses already agreed to, and the re-enactment of the Unlawful Oaths Act, were amply sufficient to repress any amount of Ribbonism or disaffection in Ireland without adding any further coercive clauses. The 5th clause provided that the Protection of Life and Property Act should continue for two years—which was equivalent to saying that any person who was suspected—and a whisper from a magistrate, a policeman, or a personal enemy was a sufficient cause of suspicion—of being guilty of misdemeanour, of being accessory to a felony, or of being a Ribbonman, might be arrested and sent to prison; and when in prison not even a Judge could bail that suspected person out, because the Habeas Corpus Act was suspended. At no previous time since the days of Runnymede had the Habeas Corpus Act been suspended for a longer period than one year, and he trusted that the Committee would not again sanction its being suspended for a period of two years. The noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) announced in 1871 that it was unconstitutional to pass such an Act as that applied to Westmeath unless it was justified by necessity; and he now called upon the noble Lord to vote against the 5th clause on the ground that the Chief Secretary for Ireland had denied its necessity, and had challenged the Committee to be very careful how they should re-enact the Westmeath Act. If Ribbonism existed, the Chief Secretary said it was sleeping, and, in the words of the adage, he (Lord Robert Montagu) said, "Let the sleeping dog lie." He had been assured by persons of the highest authority that the Ribbon conspiracy did not exist, except in the imagination of policemen and magistrates who desired to magnify their office. Bishops and priests, who had nothing to gain one way or the other, asserted its non-existence. If it did exist, then there was a curious fact—Why did the Government release Captain Duffy, the man who was said to have organized it? This man was released because he was powerless, as there was no Ribbon conspiracy. From a Return issued that morning he found that only 16 persons had been arrested under the Westmeath Act, and unless there was a necessity proved and shown for its continuance, they had no right to renew such an unconstitutional measure. He called upon the noble Marquess to abide by the principle he enunciated in 1871, and again in 1873, and to assist him in negating the 5th clause, the omission of which he now moved.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Clause 5.—(Lord Robert Montagu.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH trusted the Committee would pardon him if he did not enter at length into the arguments of the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath, who had told them that he believed the provisions of this Bill with regard to the restrictions on the possession of arms, and the renewal of the Unlawful Oaths Act for five years, were sufficient to deal with the Ribbon conspiracy. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) could only say that those restrictions and that Act existed in 1871, when they proved to be utterly inefficient to deal with the Ribbon conspiracy, and it was found necessary to ask the House to give the power which it was now sought to renew. Not only did the restrictions on the possession of arms then exist, but far stronger provisions were contained in the law at that time relating to the arrest of persons suspected of being mixed up with agrarian crime. The Government proposed to renew the Westmeath Act, because it had been found an instrument efficient for its purpose. It did not hurt anyone who did not properly fall within the scope of its provisions, and no orderly person in Westmeath or King's County was or had been in the slightest degree affected by the existence of the Act, which was a terror only to evil-doers. The noble Lord had more than once accused him of having stated to the House that the Ribbon conspiracy no longer existed. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) denied ever having made such a statement. It was usual, when words were attributed to a Member of that House, and when he denied having used those words, that the Member who charged him with having used them should take that denial as truth. What he said in his opening speech on this Bill was this—that it might be argued by the noble Lord and others who held the same opinions that the Ribbon conspiracy no longer existed, because there were no outward signs of it, and he proceeded to show the reasons which would justify the House in considering that it did still exist, but that it was dormant, and was kept so by the operation of those provisions which the Committee were now asked to renew.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he quoted the Chief Secretary's own words, which he took down at the time, to the effect that "the Ribbon conspiracy was dormant."

MR. P. J. SMYTH confirmed all that had been said by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Montagu), and repeated the protest which he entered against a continuance of this Act on the second reading of the Bill.

MR. BUTT observed, that this was by far the most important part of the Bill. He thought that the renewal of the Westmeath Act ought never to have been proposed, for it was, in truth, reviving in another form the practice, which they had protested against last year, of passing important measures in one general continuing Bill. He complained that the Chief Secretary, in introducing this Bill, had stated that the Government had confidentially consulted the magistrates of Westmeath and the adjacent districts, but had not given that information to the House. At a meeting of the clergy and people, presided over by the Roman Catholic Bishop of the district, a resolution was unanimously carried, declaring that, after careful inquiry and mature deliberation, they came to the conclusion that Ribbon organization did not exist in their country. That, at least, was as strong and reliable information as the unproduced and secret information of police officers. That, in point of fact, was all the Government had. The great majority of the Irish Members came forward and protested against this Westmeath Act, and did the Government suppose for one moment that on their part there would be any complicity with assassins? The two Members for Westmeath themselves protested against the measure, and declared it to be altogether unnecessary. It was to the representations of the Members sent to Parliament, and not to the reports of police officers, that the Government ought to seek for information. Under the Act no less than 16 men had been arrested, and were, untried, sent to gaol for long periods of imprisonment, but not the slightest particle of information was elicited as to the existence of a Ribbon conspiracy. If there were any such confederacy, it existed in defiance of the Act, which was not likely to be operative in future. The Chief Secretary for Ireland told them that murder was only in abeyance by reason of the operation of this Act. Police officers had written to Dublin Castle to that effect. Well, if the information were correct, why were not the intended murderers arrested, and the supposed victims warned of their presumably pre-arranged fate? It was obviously the duty of the Government to have the man arrested. What reliance was there to be placed on the reports of police officers under the circumstances which required them to be supplied? There was no Ribbon conspirator now in gaol; but Captain Duffy walked abroad, and in the opinion of the Roman Catholic Bishops and clergy he was released from prison on the memorial of certain magistrates, who desired to use him for their own protection, when they intended their own tenants should be evicted. Was it right, he would ask, that on a system of reports made behind men's backs the liberties of Ireland should be taken away? This part of the Bill was a novelty even in coercion, for it was not only the first time that the Habeas Corpus Act had been suspended for more than one year, but the suspension had never before been applied to persons who were not accused of treason. A more objectionable mode of legislation was never adopted than that which proposed to revive such an Act as the Westmeath Act at the end of a Bill without repealing any of its clauses. However careful the right hon. Gentleman might be in the administration of the law, he (Mr. Butt) objected to trusting him. It was not the principle of the Constitution to ask for extraordinary powers, and then to say that no person would be imprisoned who did not deserve to be so dealt with. He should certainly support the Amendment of the noble Lord, and he hoped the clause would be omitted from the Bill.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA entered his protest against the law which this Bill intended to re-enact. That law was founded on the evidence obtained in 1871, and was passed under a sense of panic. He had known Westmeath for the last 25 years, and he could speak as to the state of the county with the confidence of one who had property there, and was in the habit of collecting his own rents. He was as convinced as he was of his own existence that there was no vestige of Ribbonism active in Westmeath, or merely held in abeyance there by the fear of this Act. The Captain Duffy—who, by the way, was no Captain at all—of whom they had heard so much, conspired, no doubt, if it be possible for a man to conspire, with himself alone. Like any other ruffian who was roaming about at the time, he was made use of occasionally to carry out some indefensible design. They had no satisfactory statement of the circumstances under which Duffy had been released from durance. He believed the Westmeath Committee had been grossly imposed upon by their credence in the printed paper, which purported to set forth the Ribbon oath, but as he had already dealt with that subject, he would not now go into it.

MR. CONOLLY objected to the Amendment. It was quite evident that if these powers were entrusted to the Government the parties suspected would be under the necessity of obeying the law. He did not concede that there was any reasonable ground for excluding from the operation of the Bill either Meath or Westmeath. He did not wish that any man should be in gaol, and it was quite right that every portion of this Bill should be strictly examined; but he did not think these restrictive measures could at present be dispensed with. There was one person particularly connected with journals in Ireland who had vilified him for his conduct in this House. Now, he was always ready to answer any Gentleman who might call him in question for any expression he might have used in the course of debate; but he thought it hardly manly that one having a seat in the House should take advantage of his journal in Ireland to vilify him.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the hon. Member that he was not addressing himself to the question before the Committee.

MR. CONOLLY merely wished to add that but for that vilification it would not have been necessary for him to have taken such an active part in favour of the Bill. As to the statement made by Dr. Nulty, the Catholic Bishop, that Ribbonism did not exist in Westmeath, he knew that excellent Bishop well. He was a most amiable man, and believed that the fact was so; but the Committee had the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland to the contrary; and on that account he saw no reason why the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath should be adopted.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, that by the Amendment it was not intended to exclude Westmeath from parts of the Act, but merely to repeal the old Act passed in reference to that county, and to leave that county to the same law as was applicable to the whole of Ireland. The Bill was avowedly one for the purpose of putting down agrarian crime in Westmeath; but it was admitted that there was no crime of that kind in that county. Still, they were asked, without any reasons being given, to pass the measure, and to leave to the responsibility of the Government the mode of carrying it out.

MR. PARNELL said, that this was not a clause relating to that ordinary coercion which they had debated day after day, but one of a severely stringent and unconstitutional nature, for it gave to the Lord Lieutenant power to imprison for a certain time any man whom the police might say was suspected of being a member of a Ribbon society, but how was the Lord Lieutenant to know whether the suspicions of the police were well founded? He was firmly convinced that no Ribbonism existed in Westmeath, and for that reason it was not fair to apply an Act to it involving the suspension of the habeas corpus. The hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. Conolly) seemed indignant at the assertion being made that such was the case; but they had the evidence of the highest authorities that Ribbonism did not exist.

MR. FAY contended that the arguments of the Chief Secretary for Ireland were inconsistent, for one day he relied upon the statements of the magistrates in Ireland and the next day he said that he did not. He (Mr. Fay) believed that upwards of 30,000 Irish were in the Infantry of the British Army, so that if the assertions made with regard to the existence of Ribbonism were true it found its way even there. He did not believe it, and should therefore support the Amendment.

MR. GOLDNEY would take the liberty of reminding hon. Gentlemen, Members from Ireland, that the Act itself directed that Returns of the number of arrests made, specifying the circumstances, should be laid before the House within 14 days, so that if anything irregular occurred they would always have an opportunity of calling attention to it.

MR. WHITWELL pointed out that this clause would enlarge the area of those persons who would be subject to the operation of the Act, for it would embrace all those who were suspected through living in a proscribed district in 1871.

MR. BIGGAR said, the habeas corpus was proposed to be suspended in Westmeath, on the ground that Ribbonism existed there; but having carefully read the evidence given before the Committee, he could see no ground for such an assumption. There was not a person in gaol, and therefore there was no pretence for passing this Bill.

MR. RONAYNE, in answer to what had been said by hon. Gentlemen opposite about Returns of persons arrested being laid before the House, said, that cases had occurred in Ireland where persons had been arrested under a warrant signed by the Lord Lieutenant, and imprisoned no one knew where. In many other cases their friends were denied access to them. A man was arrested as having been accessory before a murder—a case not of suspicion, but, as stated in the Returns, of fact. Now, that man ought to have been tried, or else brought up by habeas corpus; but instead of taking either process, he was imprisoned and allowed to remain so.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 305; Noes 68: Majority 237.

CAPTAIN NOLAN proposed the following clause:—

"Provided always, anything in the original or amending Acts to the contrary notwithstanding, it shall be lawful for any barrister-at-law, for any surgeon or doctor of medicine, or any attorney or solicitor, or any clergyman in orders belonging to any denomination, or any person who pays county cess or poor rates on an annual valuation of not less than twelve pounds, to keep and to use, by himself or through his servant, one double or single barrelled fowling-piece; this, however, not to save such person from any prosecution on the part of the Excise for not having taken out a game licence or for not having paid gun tax."

All the large proprietors in Ireland were allowed the possession of such arms; and he thought that those occupiers who paid county cess or poor rates on an annual valuation of £12 should be privileged to keep a fowling-piece. He did not bind himself to a payment of county cess or poor rates on a valuation of £12, and he had no objection to the sum being larger; but he thought it was not right that the privilege to possess such arms should be conceded to the upper classes only, and withheld from the class he had named. He, therefore, hoped the Committee would adopt the clause.

New Clause — (Captain Nolan,) — brought up, and read the first time.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the Committee had already decided that licences must be taken out for fowling-pieces as for other arms. The Committee had also acceded, on his own proposal and on the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), to certain alterations which would tend materially to facilitate the possession of fowling-pieces. He had, therefore, hoped that the hon. and gallant Gentleman would not think it necessary to move this clause. The exemptions from the necessity of obtaining licences were confined to magistrates and to other officials, such as members of the Coast-guard or the Constabulary, or persons engaged in military service whose duty required them to carry arms. The proposal of the hon. and gallant Gentleman would make an invidious distinction.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY, in supporting the Motion of his hon. and gallant Friend, said, he always went back to the principle which the right hon. Baronet and the Solicitor General laid down—namely, that the Bill should be tempered with mercy in cases where no need of coercion was alleged to exist. The object of his hon. and gallant Friend was that the middle classes, who were known not to be mixed up with any unlawful societies, should be exempted from the stringency of the proposed Act, and he thought it came within the principle on which he relied.

MR. CALLAN said, that there were hon. Members in that House who would not have the power of carrying arms as the Bill stood; and surely the Government could not think that such persons were disentitled to the privilege.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought the Government could only be making a reasonable concession if they assented to the Amendment as it stood.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that if the Government helped to reject the clause, they would declare that not only had they no faith in the loyalty of the lower classes, but that they also distrusted the upper classes.

Captain Nolan

MR. MELDON, as a professional man, did not ask to be treated differently from the lower order of his countrymen, and would now vote against the new clause, were it not that the Government had itself made an exception in favour of the magistrates. He did not see why, if magistrates were allowed to carry arms, a barrister should not also be allowed to do so. Indeed, such at the present moment was the horror of the Irish people at agrarian crimes, that it became necessary that the counsel who undertook to defend those accused of it should carry arms in self-defence.

MR. BULWER said, he could not see why the clause should fix the qualification at a rating of £12 rather than £6, or why a person living in lodgings should be excluded under the clause. He could not see how the Government could accept it.

MR. FAY said, he did not like to see exclusive privileges granted to professional men. He thought that farmers with moderate holdings might be regarded as men having, in his sense of the word, strong "Conservative" instincts, and as being men not forward to violate the law.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he hoped that farmers would not be seized for carrying croquet-boxes. He knew an instance of an hon. Gentleman who was seized for carrying a croquet-box because it was so like a gun-box.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause be read a second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 45; Noes 157: Majority 112.

CAPTAIN NOLAN then moved the insertion of the following clause:—

"Any occupier of land in Ireland may apply by Petition of Right to be indemnified for any damage done to his crops by wild birds, hares, or rabbits, provided he proves such damage has accrued by reason of the operation of this Act, and all the provisions of the Statutes in force in Ireland in respect to the said Petition, and the procedure thereon, and the granting of costs of the Petition, shall extend and be applicable to any Petition so presented by such occupier."

If he were addressing a committee of English farmers they would not hesitate to insert in the Bill a provision such as he submitted for the consideration of the Committee. The damage done might, in most instances, be small; but the Committee should remember that the small margin of, say 5 per cent, was all the farmer had to live upon. It might be said that they might use poison to get rid of hares and rabbits; but it was clear that the extensive use of poison might lead to the occurrence of serious accidents, and poison, if used to keep down rabbits or birds, might also be used to kill foxes. The Bill contained a precedent for the granting of compensation, and there existed the further precedent of compensation to farmers for the injury done to crops by reason of the movement of troops over cultivated land. If it were found that the amount of compensation to be paid for damage really arising from a want of guns in a particular district was unduly large, steps would be taken to relax the stringency of the rule to suit the necessities of the case.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH could not adopt a clause which appeared to be based on a principle on all fours with one which would give manufacturers compensation for losses which accrued from the operation of the Factory Acts. If a farmer had the right of destroying these animals on his farm, he could do so in other ways than by shooting them. Hares were very few in Ireland, and rabbits could be snared, so that there was no necessity for farmers to have guns in order to protect themselves against them, and therefore no necessity for them to be compensated for losses which would not be consequent upon their being deprived of guns.

MR. BIGGAR pointed out that wild birds could not be easily snared.

MR. BUTT said, he thought that there was nothing unreasonable in the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member; but he asked him to withdraw his clause on the ground that not only the Committee, but public opinion also, was not quite ripe for doing strict justice in the matter.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MELDON moved to insert the following clause:—

(Number of divisions for holding sessions for trying offences under this Act not to be reduced.)

"During the continuance of this Act, or any Act or part of an Act hereby continued, the number of divisions or districts for the holding of sessions in any county or riding now existing for the transaction of any criminal business recognisable or determinable at any general or quarter sessions of the peace shall not be reduced, but all criminal business shall continue to be transacted in the division or district where such criminal business is now transacted."

The hon. Member explained that steps were now being taken to have all the criminal and civil business of quarter sessions transacted in one town for each county. It would work injustice if men, arrested for trifling offences under this Act, were taken out of the district in which they were known and tried in a place where they were not known.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) said, that, in the event of there being any change in the mode of conducting criminal business, it would be a change made generally, and for the convenience of the counties, and would not have special reference to this Act. He hoped that the Amendment would not be pressed.

Schedule A.

MR. BUTT moved the repeal of the 13th section of the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870, which enabled magistrates to hold inquiries into charges against suspected persons in their absence and in private, but he declined to press it to a division. He next moved the repeal of section 14, which gave power to magistrates to arrest witnesses supposed to be about to abscond at refusal to bail without the assent of the committing magistrate.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKET) said, he could not assent to the Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

MR. BUTT then moved an Amendment, the object of which was to repeal a provision enabling a magistrate, whenever a person was suspected of sending a threatening letter, to issue his warrant authorizing a search to be made of that person's house, and of all his private papers, in order to find evidence to convict him of that offence. That was a most odious power, and one entirely inconsistent with English law. It was, moreover, very liable to be abused, and in one instance of that kind a remedy was given in the shape of damages in an action, but only on the ground of some technical informality. He might have to take the sense of the Committee on that provision on the Report; but he hoped that in the meantime the Chief Secretary would seriously consider whether it might not be safely dispensed with. He acknowledged that the right hon. Baronet had made most important concessions, both in bringing in the Bill and also during its progress. He valued the latter class of concessions most, because they had been made without fear of any taunt that the Government had yielded to pressure. The right hon. Baronet, he was sure, was not influenced by any such unworthy feeling, the only pressure to which he yielded being that of reason and argument. Threatening letters were often ludicrous, and he had himself received several at which he only laughed.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, it was not without very careful consideration that the Government had proposed to re-enact that clause. Threatening letters really deserving the name, and which were too often followed by outrages that created terror, still continued in Ireland. The police had reported that three times as many threatening letters had been sent this year as in 1866, but far less than in 1870, when the clause was introduced. There still appeared to be sufficient grounds for retaining that provision, the operation of which was very carefully guarded. Cases had been brought under his notice where the power conferred by the clause had proved most valuable; and in no instance but the one to which the hon. and learned Member had referred, and in which there had been a legal remedy, had the Government any knowledge of its having been abused.

MR. RONAYNE, as an employer of labour, had frequently received anonymous threatening letters, but had always thrown them into the waste-paper basket and taken no further notice of them. He believed that one-half of the persons who received such letters acted under a feeling of cowardice in making reports respecting them to the police. He mentioned that, as regarded experts in questions of handwriting, an instance occurred at a trial of a Mr. O'Brien, at Cork, in which the handwriting was a written receipt, and certain bankers and their clerks swore that the handwriting was that of O'Brien, and he was sentenced to be hanged, and two years after the Crown required a jury to find that the same receipt was written by a Captain Mackay. So that after the conviction of one man the Crown produced the same receipt, and tried to hang another upon it. He thought, therefore, no reliance could be placed on the evidence of experts given in secret, and upon which the police acted.

Amendment negatived.

On the Preamble,

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU moved to add to line 19 the following words, which had been rendered necessary by the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt), and to which, he understood, the Government offered no opposition—

“And whereas various persons have, by reason of neglect or otherwise, not complied with the provisions of the said Acts.”

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING (in the absence of Mr. Butt) said, before the duties of the Committee were discharged he must acknowledge the fair consideration which the Irish Members generally had received from both sides of the House; that in the discussion of national and constitutional questions of great importance, the English and Scotch Members had given them a large support, and, on the whole, he thought the majority of the Irish Members would be satisfied with the manner in which they had been met by the Government with regard to the proposals they had brought forward.

MR. HERMON said, the Members on that side of the House—the Government side—had given a consistent support to the Government in the discussions on this measure, knowing it was as distasteful to them to bring it forward as it was to the hon. Gentlemen opposite. Nothing but a stern sense of duty had induced them to bring it forward, and therefore he felt bound to support them. He was very glad to hear what had fallen from the hon. Member (Mr. Downing), and he hoped the hon. Gentleman would convey those sentiments to his friends in Ireland.

MR. RONAYNE objected to the conduct of the hon. Gentlemen on the other side on the ground that they had not discussed this Bill, and had thrown all the burden of discussion on Members on his own side. He hoped and believed that the hearts and sentiments of hon. Members opposite were not with this Bill, and that they simply acted on the responsibility of the Chief Secretary for Ireland; but he thought they ought not to have done so merely on the authority of secret letters written by police officers to Dublin Castle, without requiring that proof which would have given satisfaction.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY appealed to the Government to have the Bill reprinted before the Report was brought up. Being a highly penal measure it should be made as clear as possible. Various concessions, as the Government thought, had been made, whilst many others had been refused, and it would add to a clear understanding of the subject if the Bill could be reprinted. He would undertake to assure the Government that no advantage would be taken of it if that course were adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Amendment had been proposed by the noble Lord the Member for Westmeath, and that a general discussion on the Bill would be more appropriate on the third reading.

Amendment agreed to.

On Question, "That the Preamble stand part of the Bill,"

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT wished to bear testimony to the patience and forbearance shown by Her Majesty's Government to everybody in that House during the discussions on this Bill, and also to the courage, honourable resolution, and ability evinced by the Irish Members on both sides of the House in the defence of what they no doubt conscientiously considered to be an unjust interference with the liberties of their country. He never felt greater pain and sorrow than in being obliged to assent to a restriction of the liberties of any portion of his countrymen. He should have been glad to limit the operation of the Bill to two years instead of five. He was one of those Members who had left the House when the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) proposed his Amendment, and he would explain why he did so—

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question before the Committee is that this be the Preamble of the Bill. That Question raised all the general points embodied in the Bill; but the hon. Baronet appeared to be making a personal explanation instead of discussing the Bill.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, that what he was proposing to do was to show that Clause 5 of the Bill was not in accordance with his feelings, and he wished to tell the Committee why he objected to it. ["Oh, oh!"] He would undertake to show on another occasion, why he objected to a person being arbitrarily imprisoned for more than 12 months.

MR. CHARLEY congratulated the Chief Secretary for Ireland on the repeal of the odious Press Laws, imposed upon Ireland by Lord Carlingford. He protested against the imposition of those laws in 1871; his voice was drowned in clamour; but he had the satisfaction of recording his vote with the small minority, who opposed them. The nation which was denied the freedom of the Press, was denied the first rudiments of Constitutional Government. Freedom of the Press was as essential to Constitutional Government as the air we breathe was to our existence.

MR. BUTT suggested that the Bill, with the many Amendments which had been made, should now be thrown into a clear, intelligible, and definite shape, so as to form one body of consistent legislation. It could easily be done; and no advantage—he could promise—would be taken of its altered form to re-discuss any portion of the measure.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, the Amendments made in the Bill had not been numerous. As a matter of course, the Bill would be reprinted with the Amendments; but the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member went a good deal further. It would necessitate the re-committal of the Bill, and was certainly not in accordance with the ordinary practice of the House. He had to thank the Committee for the fair and candid manner in which a protracted discussion had been conducted. He had not complained—and did not now complain—of the mode in which the Irish Members had thought it their duty, as it was their undoubted right, to discuss the provisions of a Bill to which many of them naturally objected. The task which it had been his duty to perform had not only been wearisome, but painful in the extreme, and he fervently trusted that he would never be called upon to repeat it. He had endeavoured to treat every hon. Member who had any Amendment to move with courtesy and attention, and to deal with the subject in a fair and straightforward manner.

MR. BUTT said, he thought at the end of the Committee he ought to remark that the Irish Members had nothing whatever to complain of as to the manner in which the Chief Secretary had conducted it. He had met them often with great fairness, although at times they might have considered the points he was sustaining were too severe. They had nothing to complain of in the way they had been received by the House, and the manner in which their objections had been met would have some effect in mitigating the effect these coercive measures would have upon the minds of the Irish people. He hoped the House would not take objection to the manner in which the opposition had been conducted. The Bill was unconstitutional, it vitally affected the liberties of the people, and its provisions were multifarious, and had it been applied to England it would not have passed with even so little discussion. He, however, believed it had been discussed fairly, and much as they regretted the re-enactment of these laws it could not be said an ample opportunity had not been given for the consideration of the question.

MR. DISRAELI: I merely, Sir, rise to say that I think this is the best Message of Peace which we have had for a long period.

MR. RONAYNE: I, for one, will not be any party to accept from the English Government chains, however gilded, or however accompanied by courtesy, politeness, or good manners.

MR. BIGGAR: This is not, in my judgment, an occasion on which we ought to bandy compliments. I am not going to blame the House for the want of courtesy shown to myself; but I must protest against a Bill being forced on us unsupported by reason, argument, or common sense.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he did not think that was a proper occasion for bandying compliments. He thought the question was really too serious. He intimated that the Bill would be strongly opposed on the third reading.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 154.]

Sir Michael Hicks-Beach

MR. BUTT asked when the Government proposed to take the Report?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the Bill should be printed with the Amendments without delay, and the Report would be taken on Monday next.

MR. BUTT intimated that on the Report he should certainly raise again some of the questions which had been decided against him in Committee.

SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS (re-committed) BILL—[Bill 83.]

(Mr. Slater-Booth, Mr. Clare Read.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 19th April.]

Bill considered in Committee.

Description of Offences.

Clause 6 (Provision for the sale of compounded articles of food and compounded drugs) amended, and agreed to.

Clause 7 (Protection from offences by giving of label.)

MR. A. H. BROWN moved, in page 3, at end, to add—

“Or if he shall supply such article from any box, vessel, package, or other receptacle which is clearly marked in such a way as to signify that the article is mixed, and is so placed that the purchaser of such article may be able to read what is marked thereon.”

His object was to remove the necessity of wrapping up small quantities of an article in a paper marked “mixed,” as that would entail in the case of small sales over the counter a good deal of unnecessary trouble on the seller.

MR. BRISTOWE pointed out that the clause as it stood was very good, and that the Amendment, if adopted, would open the door to fraud.

Amendment negatived.

MR. SANDFORD moved, in page 3, line 19, at end to add, “and stating the nature of the mixture,” with a view that purchasers should know what they were buying.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he thought the Amendment would tend to the manufacture of inferior goods.

MR. SLATER-BOOTH also opposed the Amendment. No information of value would be given by it to the purchaser, who would know nothing as to the quality of the materials used.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 (Prohibition of the abstraction of any part of an article of food before sale, and selling without notice).

MR. HENLEY wished to know whether the clause would relate to the case of flour? Every miller in dressing flour took out of it some of the fine flour. What he wanted to know was, whether that would render him liable to a penalty?

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that this point was provided for by the 5th clause, which enacted that the purchaser was to be furnished with a description of the quality of the flour which he demanded.

Clause agreed to.

Appointment and Duties of Analysts, and Proceedings to obtain Analysis.

Clause 9 (Appointment of analysts.)

MR. SANDFORD said, that one of the strongest points which had been made out before the Select Committee was the incompetency of the local analysts. The Bill would not remove this grievance, but would leave it as it was. He contended that in many small boroughs it was impossible to find men possessed of sufficient skill to qualify them as analysts. Why, in certain of the small boroughs the very worst sinners, as far as adulteration was concerned, were the town councillors. ["No, no!"] Hon. Gentlemen might cry "No, no," but he said "Yes, yes." It would conduce both to economy and efficiency if analysts were appointed by the county, and he therefore moved to leave out from "beginning," to "or boroughs," inclusive, in page 4, line 3, and insert—

"In England the magistrates for each county shall, as soon as possible after the passing of this Act, appoint for each county one or more persons possessing competent knowledge, skill, and experience as analysts of all articles of food or drugs sold within such county."

SIR HENRY PEEK protested against any analysts whatsoever being appointed. It had been proved before the Select Committee that there were not a dozen men in England who were fit to be analysts. He had no desire in saying that to screen the mal-practices of the trade, or to throw any obstacle in the way of the Bill; but he was persuaded the latter could best be carried into effect without analysts. There was a laboratory at Somerset House which would, if it were taken advantage of, answer all the purposes of analyses. All that was there wanted was to strengthen the staff by the addition of three or four men, at about as many hundreds per annum. He said unhesitatingly that analysts had been a complete failure over the whole country. As an instance, he alluded to the recent case of the Northamptonshire widow, who was fined for selling adulterated coffee, but two persons accused of the same offence at the same time, in the same place, and by the same local analyst sent the coffee to London to be analysed, when it was proved to be pure, whereupon the analyst, who, by the way, acted for three counties, merely said he was sorry that his apparatus being out of order he had been led into a mistake.

MR. PEASE said, he could not agree with the proposal to transfer these appointments of analysts from the boroughs to the county magistrates. He thought the former were as capable of judging in the matter as the latter, and hoped the clause would be allowed to stand pretty much in its present form.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he thought the Committee would not be prepared to accept the Amendment, which would, in the first place, swamp the small boroughs, and then give them an advantage by relieving them from contributions towards the salaries of the analysts. So far as he was aware the boroughs had acted quite as well as the counties, if not better. He could quote cases of boroughs in which the Act was excellently put in force. There was no occasion at present, whatever future experience might prove, for the whole analytical work to devolve upon a central establishment, and the Government was not prepared to assent to such a scheme.

MR. PELL agreed in the opinion that a sufficient body of competent men could not be found from whom to select analysts for the whole of the country. In his own county convictions had been obtained by an analyst, who, on one of the articles of which he complained being sent for examination in London, had been shown to be unfit for his office. Again, in Scotland, a person fined for selling adulterated milk sent the analysis on which he had been convicted to a competent chemist in London, and it was declared to be an accurate description of unadulterated milk. This was a melancholy state of things. He was a farmer, and would like to have his manure analyzed, but he would not ask a country analyst to analyze it. If he sent it to London, he would be quite satisfied with the analysis of Dr. Hassell. They were authorizing uninformed local authorities to convict upon the statements of men who had received no training for the duties which they had to perform, and there was danger that they would allow magistrates who did not represent the ratepayers to throw upon the rates the enormous expences which these prosecutions would involve.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, that in the county with which he was connected great care was taken in the appointment of an analyst, and he thought borough magistrates were quite as competent as county magistrates to appoint analysts.

An hon. MEMBER thought the appointment of analysts should be subject to the approval of the Local Government Board, with a view of securing the entire efficiency of the gentlemen appointed.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, there could be no doubt that some incompetent analysts had been appointed, who had produced analyses unfortunate for themselves and for traders. But that was very much the fault of Parliament, which provided no safeguards for the selection of competent men. Even this Bill contained no proper security that the analysts should be competent. It was important that the Local Government Board should lay down rules as to the qualifications to be required, and then both boroughs and counties might be trusted to appoint proper men. But he would say one word for the analysts who had been appointed under all the difficulties of the present system, and suddenly called upon to make analyses without preparation. Before the Adulteration Act was passed Dr. Hassell made 2,000 analyses of articles and found that 76 per cent of them were adulterated. Since the Act was passed 17,000 analyses had been made by the public analyst, and only 26 per cent of the articles were found adulterated, of which 13 were in milk alone. Much as we might lament the ignorance on the part of analysts suddenly called upon, as a whole, the work had been performed to the satisfaction and for the benefit of the public. He could not support the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman because he thought London and the large boroughs were quite able to find efficient analysts.

MR. HARDCASTLE said, the great object was to secure a really competent analyst. If we had a large number of analysts, it was probable that they would all be very inadequately paid, and probably be inefficient; but if we had one superior analyst appointed for a more extended district, we could afford to pay him well for his work, and thus secure a superior man. Practically, these analysts were placed in the position of Judges, for on their decision, rather than on the decision of magistrates, rested the question whether or not those persons who were accused of adulteration should be subjected to a penalty. Under these circumstances, he felt it his duty to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. Sandford), although at the same time, he thought the City of London was competent to appoint its own analyst.

MR. EVANS said, he hoped that some provision would be introduced to avoid for the future such gross injustice as had been inflicted on those tradesmen who, through the incompetence of analysts, had been groundlessly accused of adulteration. He believed the best course to adopt would be to appoint for the work of analysis a competent authority who would give general satisfaction.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON observed, that the analyst was all-important in the Bill. He believed that the Analytical Board of Somerset House was all-sufficient for analytical purposes. Although the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) might treat the faults of analysts very lightly, their faults might ruin the reputation of innocent tradesmen. He was inclined to think that this discussion would make analysts more careful in the future.

MR. CAWLEY said, it would be inconsistent with previous legislation to leave the appointment of analysts in boroughs with the county magistrates, who would have to go to the large towns and cities for the persons to be appointed. He should vote against the Amendment.

Mr. Pell

MR. VILLIERS said, he thought there was a great deal to be said in justification of the Amendment, because it had in view the interests of the community independently of the trader. It appeared that only 24 boroughs out of 171 had appointed analysts; whereas the county magistrates had appointed analysts in 30 cases out of 54. Now, there must be some reasons why the towns and boroughs did not appoint analysts, and if the Committee were really in earnest in preventing the enormous evils of adulteration of food, they should take care that their legislation should be effective, compulsory, and general. At present nothing could be more capricious than the operation of the existing law. It had been two years in operation, yet while in some places the law against adulteration was rigorously enforced, in others no analysts were appointed, and the law became a dead letter. The consequence was, that the unscrupulous traders sent their adulterated goods to the latter places, and enormous injury was inflicted on the community. The analysts had been condemned, but had they had a fair trial? He did not know why it should be said that they had done no good. How could it be said that persons capable of analyzing adulteration were not competent authorities? They did not exist in sufficient numbers at first; but during the last two years a sufficient number of them had come forward. The House ought to remember that wherever analysts had been appointed great public advantage had accrued. Nothing could be more ridiculous than the statements sometimes made in the House that there was now no adulteration of food. Lectures were being delivered in the metropolis which proved that all the evils that ever existed in regard to adulteration were still rampant. It had been stated, indeed, on good authority, that much of the savage ferocity displayed in recent cases of drunken assaults was attributable to the noxious ingredients with which the liquor of the lower classes was adulterated. There never was a time when, on sanitary grounds, an effective measure was more required. For 50 years such an Act had been demanded, and in 1860 an Act was passed, but no analysts were appointed, because the appointment was placed in the hands of those who took care not to appoint them.

The Act of 1872 was passed by something like an accident. The present Bill was, in his mind, no improvement on the Act of 1872, because it would diminish the protection [of the consumer, and offer facilities to the traders who practised adulteration. He hoped that the Committee would receive an assurance that the Bill would not be merely permissive, but that the word "may" in regard to the appointment of an analyst should be changed to "shall appoint an analyst."

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman could have given very little attention to the language of the Bill. The real difficulty was to insist on the appointment of analysts, when they were told that a sufficient number of competent persons could not be found. The Bill, however, extended the facilities for the joint appointment of analysts by boroughs and counties. There was, unfortunately, no School of Analytical Chemistry in this country; but, in a subsequent clause, it would be proposed to refer the analyses in certain cases to the Board of Inland Revenue, the effect of which might be that plenty of competent analysts would be found in a few years. When it was stated that county magistrates might be relied upon to carry out the Act, he would remind the Committee that the magistrates of two midland counties had appointed an analyst who was thoroughly incompetent. There were many difficulties in the way of working the Act in counties, while in several boroughs it was very well worked. The hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Lyon Playfair) had borne testimony to the general diminution of adulteration, and he (Mr. Sclater-Booth) believed that if powers were given to the Inland Revenue still greater improvements might be made.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought it would be very invidious and almost unconstitutional to say that boroughs having quarter sessions which were competent to try criminals were not to be trusted to appoint analysts. It would be invidious to particularize, but he might say that the analysts were not infallible. The country had had accounts in the newspapers of a great mistake committed by one learned man, and of another learned man correcting it. He should be sorry to see any change made in the direction of the Amendment.

Mr. MUNDELLA said that, as a borough Member, he must protest against the appointment of the local analysts being taken out of the hands of the borough authorities. He did not see why such towns as Leeds and Sheffield should not appoint their own analysts. Where were they to get the analysts unless they went to the large towns for them?

SIR WILLIAM FRASER said, he was ready to admit that the case of the City of London was peculiar, and therefore he did not object, so far as the City proper was concerned, to the appointment being vested in the Commissioners of Sewers; but, with respect to the other portion of the metropolis, he objected to the appointment being vested in the local vestries. The ratepayers would not be satisfied with such an arrangement.

MR. COLE could only say that, as a vestryman, he thought the vestries were the very best possible bodies to be entrusted with the appointment of analysts. The only difficulty was as regarded expense, which disinclined those bodies to appoint analysts at all; but that difficulty would vanish if the appointment were made compulsory, and if that was done, they would take care to appoint the best men who could be obtained.

MR. SANDFORD did not deny that the large towns would appoint able and competent men, but his object in wishing to vest the appointment in the hands of the county magistrates was to secure economy in spreading the cost over a wider area. He objected to the language of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Local Government Board in describing what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Villiers) as irrelevant. That right hon. Gentleman's observations were perfectly relevant, and he would venture to say that he knew more about the subject than the right hon. Gentleman himself. On the whole, he would not trouble the Committee to divide, because he found that, at a subsequent period, some amelioration of the clause might be effected.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SANDFORD moved the postponement of the clause, expressing his concurrence in the view which had been submitted to the Committee by the hon.

Member for Mid-Surrey (Sir Henry Peek), that it would be more satisfactory that things should be sent up to Somerset House to be analyzed.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY, in supporting the proposal for the postponement of the clause, gave it as his opinion that it was one of the most important in the Bill. He thought the public generally were of opinion that the analyzing of these things was a much easier process than it really was. He approved of the idea of making Somerset House a final Court of Appeal: but it was to be remembered that there were some articles which would not keep to be sent there, and some special provision might have to be made in regard to them. Among other reasons he had for thinking analyses should be done at Somerset House was this—that there was an impression that the analyses of local chemists depended very much on the interest of the person sending the articles, and, whether it was well or ill-founded, its existence would have a very prejudicial effect on the operation of the Act. If the analyses were made in London they would gain the respect and confidence of the whole community. Another reason he had for supporting this proposal was that hitherto, in Scotland, at all events, local authorities had not shown any disposition to pay such sums of money as would command the services of good analysts.

MR. CAWLEY said, the postponement of the clause would be equivalent to the postponement of the consideration of the Bill, and if the hon. Member desired to raise the question it ought to be done by a direct and substantive Amendment.

MR. WHITWELL opposed the Amendment. There was no reason why the counties and boroughs should not combine and appoint an analyst.

MR. RODWELL said, the clause provided for the appointment of an analyst who resided in London, if one could not be found in the county or borough of competent experience. It appeared to him almost a libel to say that in our large boroughs competent men could not be found. The clause would meet almost every possible case—it was partly permissive, and partly compulsory.

DR. C. CAMERON said that to refer all the analyses from the country to London would destroy the principle of the Bill. Somerset House had not the means of undertaking the whole analyses of the country.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, that the clause would carry out with certainty the amendments required in the existing law. He hoped the Committee would not agree to the Amendment. The Government were not prepared to set up a great Government establishment to take charge of the different localities, the expenses of which would have to be defrayed out of the Consolidated Fund.

Amendment negatived.

MR. PELL moved, in page 3, line 33, after "borough," to insert—

"Containing, according to the last published census, for the time being, a population of twenty-five thousand and upwards."

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH opposed the Amendment. If the matter was left to the discretion of the local authorities, he did not think that would limit the number of analysts, as anticipated. It was an attempt to restrain the action of the local authorities.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN said, the Amendment would preclude the city of Canterbury and the corporate town of Leamington from appointing their own analysts. He thought it would be dealing hardly with towns containing perhaps only 1,000 less in population than the limit proposed that they should be handed over to the discretion of the county bench.

Amendment negatived.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR moved, in page 4, line 3, after "boroughs," to insert—

"Provided that such analysts be not engaged in the trade of buying or selling any article of food or drugs."

Chemists frequently sold articles of food and drink besides drugs. Now, this was objectionable, because it gave them an unfair advantage over their competitors in trade, and was calculated to produce an impression on the traders that they were not fairly dealt with. There was no necessity to have traders any longer as analysts, as a sufficient number of professional chemists could easily be obtained, especially when the Bill gave power to districts to combine.

MR. COLE argued that if chemists and druggists were excluded there would be many localities deprived altogether of the services of an analyst. Persons selling drugs in country towns were often highly skilled chemists and analysts, and it was often of the greatest importance that an analysis should be made promptly, which could not be done if the thing to be analyzed had to be sent to London.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH approved of the intention of the Mover of the Amendment, but could not accept the proposal, because local analysts were, of necessity, persons engaged in trade. The Local Government Board always preferred that persons not engaged in the sale of food and drugs should be appointed analysts; but in some very important boroughs most excellent analysts had been appointed who would be disqualified by this Amendment. He believed that, in some cases, the Amendment would operate injuriously.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he was sorry that the right hon. Gentleman could not accept the Amendment. It did not seem a reasonable thing to put one tradesman in the position of having to deal with the articles of another tradesman who was his competitor in business. No practical evil could arise from the adoption of the Amendment, considering that there was the power of uniting towns together, and that the supply of professional chemists was much greater now than it was formerly.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, that it was very rarely that persons engaged in manufactures were analysts. What was wanted was professional analysts thoroughly acquainted with chemistry, and he felt so strongly on the point that he must divide the Committee on the subject.

COLONEL BARTTELOT supported the Amendment as an independent Member. It was not right that persons who dealt in particular articles should be called in to analyze them. They should appoint men who were properly qualified to perform the very important duty cast upon them.

MR. WYKEHAM MARTIN pointed out that, in some counties, a medical man in private practice was the analyst.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH believed that when a sample of an article went to be analyzed it was sent in cipher, without the analyst knowing from whom it was obtained. Those gentlemen who had already been appointed could not well now be disestablished. Although it might not be a matter on which it could rely, he assured the Committee that he would endeavour to see that proper persons were appointed for those duties.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he thought a man should not be a judge in his own case, and therefore he would support the Amendment on that ground.

MR. CAWLEY suggested that the Amendment should be confined to the special trade in which the analyst might be engaged.

MR. SANDFORD also recommended that it should be modified so as only to exclude a man who sold the articles in question within the district for which he was appointed as analyst.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, he would introduce some words on the Report to meet the views of the right hon. Gentleman.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 10 (Town Council of a borough may engage the analyst of another borough or of the county) agreed to.

Clause 11 (Power to purchaser of an article of food to have it analysed).

DR. C. CAMERON moved, in page 4, line 34, after "to," insert "the inspector or inspectors appointed under this Act, or where there is no such inspector to." The object was to ensure secrecy on the part of the analyst.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 12 (Officer named to obtain a sample of food or drug to submit to analyst) agreed to.

Clause 13 (Provision for dealing with the sample when purchased).

DR. C. CAMERON moved, in page 5, line 18, after "parts," insert "after it shall have been marked and sealed by the analyst."

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH believed the Amendment entirely unnecessary.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 14 (Provision where sample is not divided) agreed to.

Clause 15 (Provision for sending article to the analyst through the post office) agreed to.

Mr. Sclater-Booth

Clause 16 (Person refusing to sell any article to any officer liable to penalty).

MR. EARP moved, in page 5, line 38, after "sale," to insert "or on sale by retail on any premises or in any shop or stores."

DR. C. CAMERON moved an Amendment that the penalty of £5, imposed upon a person refusing to give a sample of his goods—known to be adulterated—should be increased to £20.

After a few words from MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, it was agreed to increase the penalty, in case of refusal by the seller to submit his goods for analysis, to £10.

Clause 17 (Form of the certificate) agreed to.

Clause 18 (Quarterly report of the analyst).

MR. PELL moved, in page 6, at end of clause, add—

"And every such authority shall annually transmit to the Local Government Board, at such time and in such form as the Board shall direct, a certified copy of the number of articles analyzed, and shall be entitled to receive the sum of five shillings, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, in respect of every analysis, to be applied towards the expense of executing this Act."

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH accepted the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Proceedings against Offenders.

Clause 19 (Proceedings against offenders).

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH moved, in page 6, line 31, leave out from "and" to "same," in line 33, both inclusive, and insert—

"In Ireland such penalties and proceedings shall be recoverable, and may be taken with respect to the police district of Dublin metropolis, subject and according to the provisions of any Act regulating the powers and duties of justices of the peace for such district, or of the police of such district; and with respect to other parts of Ireland, before a justice or justices of the peace sitting in petty sessions, subject and according to the provisions of 'The Petty Sessions (Ireland) Act, 1851,' and any Act amending the same."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 20 (Certificate of analyst prima facie evidence for the prosecution. Analyst to be produced if required. Defendant and his wife may be examined) agreed to.

Clause 21 (Power to justices to have articles of food and drugs analysed).

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, he had a very important Amendment to move in this clause, on which he had a great deal to say; but at that late hour—a quarter to 1—the matter was too important to be discussed. He therefore moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

SECURITY OF THE PERSON BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill for the further security of the persons of Her Majesty's subjects from personal violence, said, it was evident that some further provision was necessary for dealing with cases of brutal assault. With that view he proposed, in some measure, to extend the power given to magistrates with regard to binding over persons guilty of aggravated assaults to keep the peace. It was also proposed to do something in the direction of flogging by giving the power of flogging to Courts of Oyer and Terminer in cases of assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm, if such intent should be found by a jury, and in cases of aggravated assault on women and children, but the number of lashes was to be reduced from 50 to 25.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, the right hon. Gentleman must be prepared to expect a determined opposition to that part of the Bill which proposed to inflict the torture of flogging.

Motion agreed to.

Moved that the Lord Hampton be appointed to take the Chair in the Committees of the Whole House in the absence of the Lord Redesdale: Agreed to.

PEACE PRESERVATION ACT—CASE OF PATRICK CASEY.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

EARL SPENCER: My Lords, I must ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes before the commencement of the Business of the evening. I do so with confidence, because I know your Lordships are in the habit of allowing any Member of the House to correct any statement made in public and which affects his honour in the conduct of public affairs. I noticed in the usual channels of information of last Tuesday a statement which purported to have been made in "another place" by Mr. Mitchell Henry, the hon. Member for the county of Galway, and which, I think, does reflect on me in the manner to which I have just referred. In a discussion on the Peace Preservation Act that hon. Member alluded to the case of a person named Patrick Casey, who, when I was Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, was arrested and detained under an Act known as the Westmeath Act. Mr. Mitchell Henry is reported to have said that Casey was kept in solitary confinement for several years, that he was cut off from all communication with the outer world, and that it was his belief that Casey had been forgotten by the Government until his case was brought under the notice of the House of Commons. I have thought it right to communicate with the hon. Member, and it appears that, with some slight exception, the reports correctly represent what he said. Now, my Lords, I do not intend to discuss the wisdom of the policy of the Act of Parliament which passed in 1871; but I may say that it threw a very grave and weighty responsibility on the Government of Ireland, and more particularly on the Lord Lieutenant, who is mainly responsible for carrying it out. I endeavoured, when in Ireland, to use the powers which it conferred on me with prudence, justice, and watchfulness; and when exercising them I was in constant communication on the subject with the other Members of the Irish Government. Having said so much on the general question, I shall now endeavour to give your Lordships an accurate statement of the case of Patrick Casey, and then leave it to your Lordships to say whether there was any foundation for the statements made in "another place." First, my Lords, the hon. Member states that the prisoner was kept in solitary confinement for several years. It was wisely provided in 1871 that rules should be laid down as to the manner in which imprisonment under the Act should be carried out, and on referring to these rules, I see that during six hours a day prisoners confined under the Act were to be allowed to join other prisoners. I do not know myself exactly how those rules were carried out; but I do know that while I was in Ireland I made frequent inquiries, and that during nearly the whole of his time the prisoner was in communication with other prisoners. Within the last few months of his release he was the only prisoner charged with the same species of offence in the place where he was confined, and consequently he was in "solitary" confinement. But, my Lords, that is a very different thing from what was stated. I need not say anything as to the alleged statement about the prisoner having been cut off from all connection with the outer world, because the hon. Member takes exception to that part of the report; but when I come to the statement that the prisoner had been overlooked until the notice of the House of Commons was directed to his case, I think that a very serious charge against the Government of Ireland, and a particularly serious charge against myself, who was responsible for the Government of Ireland at the time to which allusion was made by the hon. Member. Now, my Lords, the warrant for Casey's arrest was signed on the 8th of December, 1871; he was arrested on the 13th of the same month, and I left Ireland on the 25th of February, 1874. Through the courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman, the present Chief Secretary for Ireland, I have been able to refresh my memory by a reference to official documents. I find that from the 13th of December, 1871, to the 25th of February, 1874, there were eight memorials on behalf of Casey considered by the Irish Government—and I may mention that one of those was addressed to me by the late Mr. John Martin, Member for the county of Meath. I am quite sure, from the honesty and straightforwardness of that Gentleman, that he would have been no party to such a statement as that which has rendered this explanation necessary on my part. Well, there were four special medical reports in the case, and I myself made 14 special Minutes in reference to it when brought under my consideration. On the 1st of January, 1872, application was made for permission for the prisoner to marry, he being then in the prison of Naas; and though the marriage did not come off, the permission for it was accorded. I mention this to show how carefully these cases were kept under view. In a memorial presented in November, 1873, it is stated that the prisoner "had no cause to complain of his treatment." I have further to say that at one time, with my entire approval, the prisoner was removed, by order of the Lords Justices, from Naas to Dublin, in order that he might have additional medical treatment; and in a Minute made by me on the 26th of December, 1873, after stating my decision respecting an application for his release, I added—"If his case is not brought forward by memorial before the 31st of March, let it then be submitted." I may mention that when such an application was brought forward it was always my desire, if it could be done with safety, to release the prisoner; but I considered that in this case we could not do so. I hope, my Lords, I have shown there was no justification for the statement made in "another place." I confess, my Lords, that if the statement were well founded, I should have felt unworthy to sit in your Lordships' House, and certainly most unworthy of the trust confided to me by Parliament when it placed in my hands as Lord Lieutenant powers which are inconsistent with the spirit of the English law, and which are to be justified only by the urgent necessity of protecting life in Ireland.

[NO. 44.] SECOND READING.

(The Duke of Richmond.)

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said: My Lords, I trust your Lordships will not judge of the importance of the measure now submitted to the consideration of the House by the multitude of its details, for in that case it might assume a somewhat miserable character, but I can hardly imagine a measure more interesting to the officers of the Army, and, through them, to the country at large, than the one now before your Lordships. I am happy, however, to think that its advocacy does not call for any elaborate or eloquent address on my part; because, though large as are the interests at stake, the proposition itself, when thoroughly and carefully examined, will be found to resolve itself into so very simple and moderate a one, that I should not be justified in detaining your Lordships at any great length. Now, my Lords, I wish at the outset to state—and I do so with confidence—that what is called the subject of Purchase is by no means attached to or bound up with that of exchanges—the Bill to which I ask your Lordships to give a second reading has no more to do with the re-introduction of Purchase than almost any subject altogether irrespective of Army interests. Purchase was put an end to by the Royal Warrant of 1871. I assure noble Lords that I am not going back to the controversy on that subject; I shall deal with the abolition of Purchase as an accomplished fact, and not go back either upon that system or the question of the means taken by the late Government to put an end to it. What has been done I accept as an accomplished fact, and I do not wish to re-open that part of the question. I allude to the subject only to give myself the opportunity of stating that Purchase and Exchange are two different things. Under the system of Purchase an officer bought the steps by which he advanced himself in the Army. Under the system of Exchange the officer exchanges from one regiment into another; but he rather loses than gains, because, by means of an exchange, he loses the seniority he holds in the regiment he is leaving. I confess I was somewhat astonished to find that some persons have objected to exchange on the ground that it has a tendency to re-establish the Purchase system, inasmuch as it gives occasion to the payment of a bonus. It is argued that the officer who exchanges out of one regiment into another derives an advantage for which he would be willing to pay, and that under such a system the junior officers might bribe a senior officer to exchange into another regiment, that those remaining behind might benefit by the step so taken. Those who advance that argument—and it has been advanced more than once in "another place," and perhaps will be advanced here to-night, though I do not expect that the noble Viscount the late Secretary for War will advance it, because he knows that it is unsound, can scarcely be aware of the true nature of exchanges. Suppose a man is a senior captain in a regiment, it is highly improbable that he would be induced by a bonus to retire from a position he had been endeavouring to attain for many years, because not only would he not obtain in the regiment to which he exchanged the position he occupied in the one he had left, but he would find himself in his new regiment at the feet of some 10 or 20 captains who in that regiment would be his seniors. Therefore I say that, even supposing the payment of a bonus were possible in accordance with the regulations of the military authorities, I say that on the face of it the arrangement would be so extraordinary that men would not be found to enter into it,—it would naturally arrest the attention of the authorities, and provoke inquiry. There is, therefore, really nothing of Purchase in the proposition before your Lordships. I hope it is not necessary to assure your Lordships that my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War has no desire to bring back the system of Purchase—did he do so, he is far too straightforward and honourable a man to attempt it by an indirect and underhand course—he would have proposed it in a straightforward and open manner, in a way that would afford Parliament an opportunity of expressing a direct opinion on the proposal.

It may now, my Lords, be convenient that I should state the way in which Purchase and Exchange were carried out up to the time when the Royal Warrant of 1871 was issued. By a statute of Edward VI. the purchase and sale of offices were rendered illegal, except in the case of commissions in the Army. The Act 49 of George III. extended that statute to military commissions, unless the prices paid were such as had been laid down by regulation. With regard to exchanges the same rules did not prevail—the regulation prices for Purchase had been fixed, but there were no regulations laid down for exchanges, and up to the issuing of the Warrant of 1871 payment on exchanges were illegal. But when Purchase was abolished the noble Viscount (Viscount Cardwell) who was then Secretary for War, found that it was necessary to legalize and authorize a system of exchanges, and he did so under certain regulations into the details of which I must ask your Lordships to follow me. I have to apologize to the noble Viscount for having to allude to him so often, but circumstances render it necessary that I should do so. The noble Viscount, I think, very wisely admitted that a system of exchanges was necessary for an Army portions of which are sent to our Colonial possessions and to India—an Army which finds itself scattered in so many different parts of the globe. I cannot think that any of your Lordships fail to thoroughly understand and appreciate the necessity of allowing a system of exchanges in such an Army; and I was astonished to find that in “another place” a right hon. Gentleman had expressed surprise that such a system was allowed, basing that surprise on the fact that such a system would not be permitted in any other profession. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) gave an illustration to show how it would work in another profession, but I cannot help thinking that his illustration was neither appropriate nor happy. He said—“What would be thought if a Judge in the Court of Common Pleas, finding himself overworked, wished to exchange with a Judge in the Exchequer, and if the Lord Chancellor—who holds a position in the law analogous to that occupied in the Army by the illustrious Duke the Commander-in-Chief—sanctioned an arrangement by which that exchange was brought about.” The cases are not at all similar. To put them on all fours with one another you must imagine that the Lord Chancellor, as legal Commander-in-Chief, had the power to order the Judge of the Common Pleas off to Gibraltar within a month, from which, after some time of good service, he is sent to the Cape, from which, after an efficient administration of the law, he is told he is wanted to proceed to Madras, from which, after a period of judicial labour, he is requested to proceed to Australia, with an intimation that he will be expected to dispense law and justice in China, and, perhaps, the West Indies before his return home. Now, that would be something like the course of duty which an officer in the Army may be called upon to perform; and if the typical Judge of the Common Pleas could be called on to go round the world in that way, the surprise of his exchange with another Judge being sanctioned by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack might not be so great as was suggested in “another place.” I think we should not see on the Bench all those eminent persons who now occupy that position, and that those who are there would be quite as clamorous for a system of exchanges as are now the officers of the Army. Then, my Lords, consider the benefit the country has received in the service from the existence of liberty to exchange. Remember how many distinguished officers have by it been enabled to gain a reputation in India, and render the greatest service to their Queen and country. I allude to such officers as Sir Henry Havelock and others whose career would have been lost to themselves and their country had they not been able to remain in India at a time when it would have been inconvenient for them to return home.

Indeed, I think it is admitted by all military authorities, as well as by the late Secretary for War, that such a system is absolutely necessary as well for the interest of the country at large as for those of the Army, if the two interests are not absolutely identical. When military and naval subjects are being discussed in Parliament we are accustomed to hear frequent references to what is being done in other countries. It was so in the discussion on guns the other night, when we were told that we must go on, however tentatively, in the direction of the adoption of breech-loaders, because France and other countries had adopted them. But, my Lords, take up the French military newspapers and what will you perceive? Why, that they are full of advertizements of proposed exchanges; and I am informed that in the case of exchanges in the French Army, the only requirement is the sanction of the two commanding officers of the respective regiments. The only condition annexed in addition to that requirement is that no money whatever shall be required from the State.

Now, my Lords, having, as I hope, established the first point—namely, that exchange is necessary, I shall now endeavour to establish the second—namely, that money must be allowed to pass. And here, again, I find the noble Viscount the late Secretary for War assenting to the proposition of the Government, for he not only admits that exchanges must be allowed, but that money must pass, though only in a limited manner. I think, however, that I shall show it is not desirable money should pass in the way proposed by the noble Viscount. He allows of the Exchange, but he will only allow money to pass to the extent necessary to provide for an outfit. I shall name to your Lordships the items which, under the noble Viscount's Regulation, are allowed to be paid by an officer exchanging with another for the convenience of the richer man. The poorer man sends in to the Military Secretary expenses of which the following may be regarded as example:—First, there are mess and band subscriptions; next, there is change of ordinary uniform—the amount of that the tailor might determine; and it would not be difficult to arrive at the amount to be paid for the passage of the officer. Next to that comes passage of officer's wife, and after that passage of his children. Well, these expenses it may not be difficult for the Military Secretary to estimate. But when we come to item No. 6, we find it to be "expenses and passage of female servants." I think it is trenching somewhat upon the duties of a distinguished officer like Sir Alexander Horsford, or any other Military Secretary, to cast upon him the duty of deciding how many female servants are to accompany a gentleman's family—he cannot tell what may be their requirements, and he may have to inquire in such a case whether the lady's maid is to do duty as nursery maid also during the voyage. These are duties which the Military Secretary ought not to be called upon to undertake; but next comes a still more embarrassing item for a Military Secretary, "Outfit for wife and children." How in the name of wonder is the Military Secretary to say what is a proper outfit for a lady and her family, whom he may never have had the good fortune to set eyes upon, whose habits he knows nothing about, and of whose belongings he is perfectly ignorant? It is next to impossible for him to come to a satisfactory conclusion on the point—more especially as the value of the outfit varies from £30 to £100. How, I ask, can distinguished officers be expected to be judges of the quality of underclothing a lady should take out, or the number of frocks the children will need? I pass over item No. 8—"Hotel expenses for officers," and come to No. 9—the final one. This is "Baggage expenses." Is the number of trunks and portmanteaus for the officer, his wife, children, and servants all to be considered by the Military Secretary? Manifestly, there will be inequality in such a system, because unmarried officers will gain advantages which married officers with families cannot derive from it. My Lords, if you have an open exchange, untouched and unembarrassed by calculations such as those to which I have been referring, the arrangement will be of a nature satisfactory to all parties. The principle of this Bill is—first, that exchange should be allowed; secondly, that it ought to be open and unlimited. A Commission was appointed by the late Government to inquire into the Memorials and Petitions of a number of Officers praying Her Majesty for relief from Grievances of which they complained. That Commission took a great deal of evidence, and, if I may be allowed to say so, most valuable evidence was given by the illustrious Duke who commands-in-chief Her Majesty's Army. I think I cannot do better than quote a portion of this, commencing with Question 157:—

“Your Royal Highness is aware of the practice of exchanging on the part of officers from one corps to another?—Yes.

“Under certain restrictions for the benefit of discipline, they were freely allowed by your Royal Highness to do so?—Certainly.

“And by your Royal Highness's predecessors?—Certainly.

“It was considered advantageous to the public service to allow those exchanges?—They were most beneficial to the public service.

“No question was asked as to what sum of money passed in consideration of the exchange?—None whatever.

“It was perfectly well known to your Royal Highness and your predecessors, and generally to the authorities, that money did pass for those exchanges?—I have no doubt of it.

“And no inconvenience, but, on the contrary, benefit arose to the public service from that system?—Certainly. No exchange took place without my authority, and if I did not consider it of advantage to the public service, or just to the officers in each regiment concerned, I would not allow it. I never asked any questions, of course, as to the money, but I judged of each case entirely on its merits. If afterwards money passed, that of course was no concern of mine.

“Your Royal Highness had the perfect power of controlling it to any extent you thought proper?—Yes; it was entirely in my option to allow it, or not.

“I believe that when an exchange of that sort took place each officer went to the bottom of the list of his new regiment?—He went to the bottom of his rank; that was invariably the case.

“The benefit of the service was the first consideration?—That, of course, was the first consideration; but I think that the public service would have been injured if any discontent had been caused by allowing a very junior officer to be put over the head of a senior in the junior rank.”

Those are the opinions of the illustrious Duke, and I think it goes to show your Lordships that a well-regulated system of exchange is of great advantage to the public service. We hold, then, that no account of the money that passes should be taken by the military authorities, who should decide on the proposed exchange principally on its merits as regards the Army and the public. The next quotation I shall make is from the evidence given before the Commission by Sir Richard Airey, whose authority on the subject will be recognized by noble Lords who are not connected with the Army, and still more by noble Lords who are members of the military profession—

“With regard to the practice of exchanges, His Royal Highness has stated that no inconvenience arose to the public service from the freely-permitted practice of exchanges from one corps to another, but that, on the contrary, there was an advantage to the public service, and a considerable benefit to the individual officers concerned; is that your opinion?—In my opinion it was of very great advantage to the service. Putting the question of the convenience of officers out of consideration, although I believe that that is an element in the matter, the great question is the efficiency of the service, and I think that it was of very great advantage. A good officer from particular circumstances was perhaps obliged to be in England; he could not be in England except by exchange into a regiment at home, and it was allowed without any question of what mutual arrangement took place between the individuals.

I could make elaborate quotations to the same effect; but I shall not detain your Lordships by doing so, because the Blue Book containing it is before your Lordships—I may, however, quote from the recommendations of the Commission, and I think I may assume that the Royal Commissioners were honest and impartial men: and I do the noble Viscount opposite the credit of believing that he would not have named them for appointment by Her Majesty if he did not regard them as men competent to deal with and come to a decision on the questions referred to them. The Commissioners say—

“It has been repeatedly and forcibly urged upon us that the prohibition of paying and receiving money for exchanges, between Officers on full pay, is a serious hardship to some and a serious loss to others. It does appear to us that the complaint is a legitimate one. The new rule has obviously proceeded from an apprehension that to allow any pecuniary bargaining between Officers in respect of their commissions might be as a letting out of the waters, bringing back bonuses, over-regulation prices, and the other incidents of the abolished system. We are not satisfied that there is any real danger of this, and we are satisfied upon the evidence before us that a return to the old practice as to exchanges would be very acceptable to the Army. There are many good Officers of slender means who would be willing to serve in India or elsewhere for a consideration, and there are many good Officers more blessed with the world's goods who, for family or other reasons, or under medical advice, would be willing to give such a consideration. The exchange is an unmixed benefit to both, and would probably be a benefit, and certainly would not be detrimental to the service. It ought only to be effected with the sanction and under the control of the authorities, and on such conditions as to insure that nobody else is superseded or affected. These are the substantial grounds of this complaint which appear to us to be well founded, and we do not hesitate to recommend that the above-named prohibition should be removed."

If I were to speak for a week, I could not put the case for the Bill stronger than it is put in that passage of the Report of the Royal Commission:—and I would beg of those who object to exchanges under such a system as we propose to remember that the advocates of the abolition of Purchase recommended it on this among other grounds—that it would be for the advantage of poor officers. But, my Lords, having a great respect for those who comprised the Royal Commission, I am bound to notice something that has been said "elsewhere." It has been urged against the recommendation of the Commissioners that as to this part of their Report the Commissioners had failed ultra vires, and that the subject of exchanges was one with which the Commissioners were not competent to deal. I do not know that this objection will be taken in your Lordships' House; but as it was taken "elsewhere" by one who occupies a high position and is entitled to great respect, I think it necessary to notice it. Now, my Lords, the Royal Commissioners were Lord Justice James, the noble and learned Lord opposite (Lord Penzance), and, though last not least, my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty. Your Lordships will perceive that the objection to which I have just alluded involves the supposition that these three Commissioners did not understand the terms of the Reference in the Commission which was laid before them and under which they were appointed. As for myself, I should be content to take the opinion of any one of them as to the nature of that Reference; but it would appear that all three agreed in thinking that the terms of the Reference enabled them to consider the question of exchanges. Now, let us look at the terms of the Reference—

"Whereas by our Royal Warrant, dated the 20th day of July 1871, We were pleased to cancel and determine all regulations made by Us or any of our Royal Predecessors or any Officers acting under our authority, regulating or fixing the prices at which any commissions in our Forces might be bought, sold, or exchanged . . . And We do give and grant to you or to any two of you full power and authority to call before you such persons as you may deem necessary, and to obtain information from them upon the subjects of your inquiry, and of every matter connected therewith, and also to call for, have access to, and examine all such official books, documents, papers, and records as may appear to you, or to any two of you, likely to be of use in affording you the fullest information."

Your Lordships will have perceived that by the first part of the reference the matters to be discussed are "commissions in our Forces which might be bought, sold, or exchanged;" and that by the second part full powers are granted to any two of the Commissioners to do the acts mentioned in that portion of the Reference. I cannot think that this of itself would be sufficient to dispose of the objection that when the Commissioners dealt with the subject of exchanges their action was ultra vires: but when I look at a certain correspondence I find that the noble Viscount himself admits the power of the Commissioners to deal with the subject of exchanges, because in a reply to the Commissioners which Major Vivian wrote by the authority of the noble Viscount there is this passage:—

"There were doubtless many instances in which exchange being the subject of a pecuniary transaction was a gain to one of the officers concerned at the expense of the other. The extent to which exchanges have obtained in the purchase corps during the last ten years is shown in the table marked (G). Evidence, however, can be given by the Army Purchase Commissioners that the present rule, which admits of the actual expense being paid by one of the parties for the other, does not operate in all cases to reduce the amount which would have been paid under the former system. The object of the new rule is to render the practice conformable to the law (49 Geo. III., c. 126), as well as compatible with the reasonable requirements of personal convenience. How far it has accomplished the latter object will appear also from the Return G. In connection with this subject it may be observed that under the new system of linked battalions when it shall have come into full operation, a great facility and advantage in respect of exchange will be given, inasmuch as an officer abroad will be able to exchange with an officer of the same brigade at home without loss of position on the list."

That shows the noble Viscount was perfectly well aware that the Royal Commissioners were dealing with the subject of exchanges and that he did not object to their doing so. I think, therefore, the noble Viscount will not adopt the objection raised "elsewhere," that the Commissioners were acting ultra vires. But there is the other objection, which struck me as extraordinary—namely, that though the Royal Commissioners

plained. That Commission took a great deal of evidence, and, if I may be allowed to say so, most valuable evidence was given by the illustrious Duke who commands-in-chief Her Majesty's Army. I think I cannot do better than quote a portion of this, commencing with Question 157 :—

That shows the noble Viscount was perfectly well aware that the Royal Commissioners were dealing with the subject of exchanges and that he did not object to their doing so. I think, therefore, the noble Viscount will not adopt the objection raised "elsewhere," that the Commissioners were acting ultra vires. But there is the other objection, which struck me as extraordinary—namely, that though the Royal Commissioners to serve in the most distant parts of the world, it is desirable and necessary that there should be a reasonable system of exchanges, and we were not indifferent to that subject; but in 1871 we believed—and I think the country believed—that we had, by the payment of a great sum of money, got rid once and for all of the interference of private pecuniary transactions for the purpose of profit in the affairs of Her Majesty's Army; and what we object to now is, not that there should be exchanges with every convenience for officers, but that there should be the passing of money and a profit made by those exchanges. The Royal Commission of 1857 remarked that it was not surprising that pecuniary transactions should prevail in the Army at a time when places in civil life were the subjects of Purchase: but it will, I think, hereafter be a matter of surprise that when purchase had been utterly abolished, not only in civil life, but even in the Army itself, the Acts of George III. and even of Edward VI. should have been repealed, and for the first time in our history a special invitation have been given by Parliament to a traffic in exchanges. I cannot see why it should be requisite to give a pecuniary stimulus to the officers of the Army which is not asked for in any branch of the Civil Service, which would not be endured in the Navy, and which no one was ever heard to propose for the non-commissioned officer or private soldier. But what are we doing now? This Bill consists of only 24 lines; but it repeals, as far as regimental exchanges are concerned, the Act of 1809, which was passed after so much difficulty and controversy, which was intended to put an end to irregular pecuniary transactions in the Army; but, more than that, it goes back to the Act of Edward VI. and repeals it as far as regimental exchanges are concerned. The noble Lord near me (Lord Cottesloe) has for 30 years been Chairman of the Customs. During that period he had many exchanges to sanction. Did he ever hear of its being proposed that those exchanges should be the subject of pecuniary consideration? On the contrary, he will tell you that everybody coming to him for his sanction of exchange had to make a declaration that no money had passed. When a gentleman has given what the Royal Commission call a "consideration" he is very apt to imagine that he is possessed of a property in that for which he has given a consideration; but I do not think that it will tend to facilitate business in the War Office if so large a number of exchanges and for such large sums of money should be effected under this Bill as we find in page 175 of this Appendix. When an officer has been permitted to obtain an exchange for a large sum of money, under the sanction of an Act of Parliament, and the authorities know that he has done so, it is impossible that his services can remain at the disposal of the Crown as freely as they ought—as freely as they would if no such payment had been made. It is argued, indeed, that they will, and so they will in law; but so they will not in fact: they ought not, and they cannot, so long as human nature continues what it is—so long as genial and kindly men continue to administer the affairs of the Army. Is there any necessity for a pecuniary stimulus to be given to exchanges? There are many volumes of Blue Books on the subject, and they are full of evidence on this point. First the Duke of Wellington, next Lord Hardinge, and then the illustrious Duke—they all discourage a great number of exchanges. In every discussion which has ever taken place on the subject of the Army, how great has been the stress which has been laid upon the excellence and importance of the regimental system. In the evidence of 1857, the noble Duke who sits behind me (the Duke of Somerset) asked the illustrious Duke whether, with reference to the regimental system and to the maintenance of the esprit de corps, he thought it desirable to encourage numerous exchanges; and the answer of the illustrious Duke was that it was not desirable. The rule laid down by the Duke of Wellington and by Lord Hardinge was this—to allow no one to exchange when his regiment was ordered on foreign service; and the illustrious Duke said that he had walked in their footsteps in this respect. Is it, then, desirable that when a regiment has reached its station, individual officers should be encouraged to return? Your Lordships will remember the statement by Lord Clyde. That distinguished soldier told the Royal Commission of 1857—

"I had one of the nicest corps of officers, when I was ordered out to China. All those men embarked with their regiment; but as soon as that service was over, and they had to remain in a climate like that of China, most of them immediately exchanged, and I lost all my young friends whom I so much loved."

Lord Clyde drew the moral of that state of things; he said—

"There is no sacrifice too great for the State to make to those men who will remain with their regiments, in every colony, and above all in India. . . . to continue with the soldiers, to share their difficulties, to remain with them, to encourage them when sick, and to fight with them, when they are required to do so. I do not think that any sacrifice would be too great on the part of the State to effect that object."

If such be the policy of the country and of the regimental system, of which we have heard so much, then I ask, what is this Bill? It is not unimportant, repealing the Act of George III. and repealing the Act of Edward VI., and creating pecuniary inducements in order to make officers more ready to leave their regiments, to impair the regimental system, and to frustrate the policy which Lord Clyde said it would be worth any sacrifice for the country to promote. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) referred to that illustrious soldier, Sir Henry Havelock. Well, the result of the old system was that Sir Henry Havelock spent all his life in India. Is it a good thing that there should be one set of officers who spend all their lives in India, and another set who spend all their lives in the comforts and luxuries of London? Would it be a reassuring thing, if you suddenly found yourselves obliged to face a foreign enemy, to have to call home the Havelocks from India because your officers at home had not the advantage of Indian and Colonial service? It may be one of our inconveniences with respect to the Army that we should have some 60,000 men in India and between 20,000 and 30,000 in the British Colonies; but what is our consolation? It is that in time of peace these men obtain an experience which would be denied them at home, and that in time of war we have always officers and men on whose practised skill we can rely. But when you change your system—when you have half your officers constantly in India and another half constantly at home—you will lose that advantage. Then there is another consideration—one set of officers will be rich and the other class poor. In every society we have poor and we have rich; but it is always our duty to minimize that distinction as far as we possibly can. The Army is not for the rich and the Army is not for the poor; it is for those who, whether rich or poor, have zeal to serve their Queen and country and to discharge the duties that the Service may impose upon them. But this Bill has this defect—it tends to distinguish the rich from the poor; it is unduly favourable not to the poor but to the rich officer. I will tell you why it is not likely to be favourable to the poor man serving in India. The poor man serving in India, and finding himself or his wife overcome by the climate, has, under the present regulations, a fair chance of obtaining an exchange upon paying the limited sum allowed; but when this Bill passes an exchange will become the property of the person who can open his purse widest, while the poor man who may be sick or who may have a sick wife will have no chance of obtaining an exchange as long as there is a richer man in the country desirous of coming home. The consequence will be that you will have the poor man always in a disagreeable climate and the rich man always at home. My Lords, the advantage pointed out by the Royal Commission is nothing but "the consideration" of which they speak. I demur altogether to that question of "consideration," where the inconveniences of the Service will go to one class of men and the advantages to another. And this I say, that the argument that the poor officer cannot live upon his pay is not an argument that ought to be heard from the Crown or accepted by Parliament. It is the business of the Treasury of this country so to pay our officers that every man can live upon his pay. [Laughter.] Noble Lords may laugh; but I do not say this because I have ceased to be charged with the burdens of office. At all events, something was done towards that end by saving the officer the interest of his purchase money. And this besides was done. So long as the Purchase system was in existence, you had always an answer to applications for increased pay and advantages to officers. Suppose I had asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to increase the pay or allowances of officers, his answer would have been—"Do you suppose I am going to part with public money for the purpose of increasing the over-regulation 'value of officers' commissions?" We took away that argument from the Chancellor of the Exchequer by the abolition of Purchase, and I advise you not to give him by this Bill another argument, and if, at any time, you consider that you have a claim upon the Treasury for any increase of pay or allowances, enable him to say—"Parliament has taken the matter into its own hands, and has given a mode by which the poor officers may obtain money out of the pockets of the rich." My noble Friend has given me credit by anticipation for not raising in this debate the question of Purchase. I am sorry that I feel compelled to disappoint the hopes of the noble Duke. I should be extremely sorry by any oversight to fall into any argument which would be unfair or could not be properly sustained; but perhaps I may be able to elicit from the noble Duke some information which may show me that I am entirely mistaken in the view that I have hitherto taken of this subject. I understand that the first justification of this Bill, as stated by the Secretary of State for War in the House of Commons, was expressed in these words—"A man may be dissatisfied with the battalion to which he is posted." If that is so, I presume this Bill will find him the power to give his money in order to be transferred to a battalion which he does like. If that be so, what price is to be paid for the exchange? I presume he will pay the price of the better battalion which may be in the market. I do not suppose that there will be any regulations by which the left hand will take back what the right hand has given, and therefore everybody will be encouraged to make these exchanges. If that be so, I do not understand how it can be said that these exchanges have nothing to do with Purchase. It is true that they will have nothing to do with Purchase in reference to entering the Army. The mode in which young men can obtain access to the Army at present is either by competition in examination or in consequence of service in the Militia. But that is entrance to the Army. It does not give the right to a Commission in any particular battalion. When they are posted to a battalion, it is either to the Guards, by the selection of a colonel of the Guards, or by the appointment of the illustrious Duke, if it is to a battalion of the Line.

Viscount Cardwell

Do I understand that any young man who does not like the battalion to which he has been posted may, if he chooses, negotiate with one appointed to a battalion of the Guards, or any favourite battalion of the Line, and make an exchange? If so, then every commission given by a colonel of the Guards, and every commission in a more favoured regiment, given by the illustrious Duke, will become a saleable commission, and bear its market price. Then the noble Duke says that it is impossible that there should be a purse made up for the purpose of inducing senior officers to exchange to another battalion. Why is it impossible? At first sight it would appear to be not impossible, but inevitable. It is true that promotion depends upon selection; but selection pays a due regard to seniority on the regimental list. Advancement on the list will always be of money's worth. But this, I understand, is to be provided against by regulations, and by a declaration. I do not at all dispute the value of regulations or the value of declarations, and I should be the last person to attribute to anyone that he would forfeit his honour and make a false declaration. But I think it is not very wise legislation to put the temptation in the way. I think it an impolitic measure to create this strong temptation, and then to rely upon strong declarations to counteract it. It has not been our experience that strong declarations have been effectual safeguards against strong temptations. When I first entered the House of Commons we had to produce our qualifications; but it was found many of them were not worth the paper on which they were written, and it is to the honour of a Conservative Government that they abolished them. We are at this moment occupied in passing a Bill for the prevention of simony in the Church, which would not be necessary if the declarations of clergymen, or of the patrons of livings could prevent it. And in regard to the Army, nothing could be stronger than the General Order by which in 1783 over-regulation payments were forbidden, or the declarations by which the honour of the officer and the gentleman was pledged for the observance of that General Order. These declarations proved to be of no effect whatever. In 1824 they were discussed by the House of Commons, which thought:

it was extremely hard that officers should first be exposed to strong temptation, and then be subjected to stringent declarations to prevent the temptation taking effect. What was the result? Did the House of Commons enforce the observance of these declarations? Quite the contrary. It abolished the declarations, and left the practice where it was. I hope I shall not be misunderstood as implying for a moment that anybody will make a false declaration; but I say it is very doubtful policy to adopt a system which shall afford strong temptations, and have no other safeguard than stringent declarations. It is said we have another protection—we shall have the greatest possible vigilance on the part of the military authorities. I believe this will be so; but we know that the military authorities, like everybody else in civil administration, are subject to this difficulty—that they cannot know a thing at all unless they know it officially; they may be almost certain that a particular thing exists; but unless they have full and official information they cannot act—they cannot refuse what on the face of it appears a fair and reasonable request because they have some suspicion or have been told something privately. When they had conceded a point as to which they had no adverse information, another officer will come next day and ask for the privilege conceded to his predecessor. Perhaps there may be almost a certainty that there is something wrong, but nothing can be done without official information. Thus each of these acts is a precedent for a future occasion; a body of precedents is piled up until a general rule is established, and so evils creep into systems—Parva motu primo. The concessions asked for are always described as small matters—little conveniences to a large number of gentlemen—then little difficulties are dealt with; little by little the rule grows up, and the time comes when you regret having ever entered into the career at all, and endeavour to retrace your steps. If, however, you have to retrace your steps in this matter, do you think you will be able to do so without another compensation? It is quite true that the strongest statements have been made that no compensation will be allowed. But what will be said? Why, it will be said—"In 1871 you were dealing with acts which Parliament had declared to be a misdemeanour and a crime, and yet you compensated the officers to the full. Since then an Act of Parliament has passed expressly inviting us to do this. We have been acting," it will be added, "not only in compliance with the permission of Parliament, but in obedience to an invitation to us by Parliament." If such a case is set up, what answer can you make to it? My Lords, I have endeavoured to state—at greater length than I had intended—the danger now before us if your Lordships invite the agency of money in dealing with the Service of Her Majesty. I have shown that you will deprive the Crown of a portion of its just control over those whom you permit to purchase their exchanges; that you will divide the officers into classes—the rich and the poor—those who have experience, and those who have not; that you will teach the poor officer to look to his richer brother for the pay for which he ought to be indebted to the State alone; that your measure will tend to create, at every step of the ascent, from the first commission to the command of the battalion, a saleable value, and a market price; and with that value and that price, to revive the system of barter and traffic which used to prevail. I have shown you that the obsolete securities which you propose to restore, the declarations of officers, and the vigilance of the authorities, have never been effectual either for officers of the Army, or for clergymen, or Members of Parliament; and that if these securities shall fail you now, you will inevitably be called upon for the payment of a second compensation. It was only three years ago that we were able to get rid of the system of Purchase, and I can only hope that your Lordships may never have occasion to regret that the evils then existing have been renewed by the Bill now before you.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now,") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months.")—(The Viscount Cardwell.)

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I can say on my own behalf, and I think I may say for my Colleagues, that we are glad the noble Lord and his Friends have challenged the second reading of this Bill, and have thus brought this question to a direct and simple issue. No man is better entitled to speak on this subject than the noble Viscount; and if in the public mind, or in the mind of any part of the public, there exists—as I believe there does—mistake and misapprehension as to the objects and as to the probable working of this Bill, it is far better that whatever can be said against it should be said here—said in the presence of competent and unbiased judges—and said by those who, like the noble Lord, are capable of doing justice to their own side of the case, and ready also, as I believe, to do justice to the arguments of those who take an opposite view. We do not shrink from—on the contrary, we invite a close and full discussion. We know—that is not disputed—that we carry with us the opinion of the Army. We believe that we have in our favour the opinion of the great majority of the public which interests itself in these subjects; and we think that the objections which have been taken to our proposal—or at least those on which the greatest stress has been laid out-of-doors—are of the kind which look large and formidable at a distance, but which when you examine them closely shrink to very small proportions indeed. I do not want to dwell for more than a moment on the competency of the Commissioners to entertain this question. The noble Viscount and his Colleagues are, no doubt, the best judges of what they intended to refer to the Commission: but, whatever the intentions of the noble Lord and his Colleagues, the fact remains that the course which we adopt is recommended by three Commissioners selected for their eminence and impartiality, and appointed to deal with a subject which appeared to include this question. No man contends that the late Government are bound by a decision to which they are not parties; but it is fair, on the other hand, that we should support ourselves by the authority of gentlemen selected for such a purpose, and who undoubtedly brought to the study of that subject a greater amount of care and attention than could reasonably be expected from any outside authority. My Lords, I will grapple at once with that which, as I believe, lies at the bottom of the opposition which has been made to this Bill—I mean the idea that we are trying insidiously, and by a side-wind, to restore the abolished system of Purchase.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL: I disclaim that idea.

THE EARL OF DERBY: The noble Lord, I think, conveyed the idea that if this were not our intention, it would be the result of the Bill. If this were so—if I could even see any plausible ground why the suspicion should be entertained—I think we should have been very shy of dealing with this question. There may have been—there were—wide differences of opinion as to the expediency of the Purchase system while it lasted. Personally—I do not take credit to myself for it—but, as a matter of fact, I believe I am one of the oldest opponents of that system in this House; for I remember speaking against it nearly 20 years ago, before the Commission of 1857 was appointed. But whatever anyone may have thought before Purchase was abolished—whatever anyone may think of the constitutional character of the proceeding by which it was abolished—I apprehend that no rational man considers its restoration now either possible or desirable. The thing is done: the inconveniences attending every large change are mostly got over; the officers have many of them received their money—to try and revive the Purchase system openly would be insane; to try and do it insidiously would be dishonourable, even if it were possible. But, except in the fact that under Purchase, money passed between officers under certain circumstances, and that money will under quite different circumstances pass for Exchanges in future—except in that, where is the likeness of the two things? I confess I cannot see it. Under the Purchase system an officer bought his step, gaining thereby, in return for the money which he paid, higher pay and higher military rank. The officer who could not pay was passed over, and his promotion retarded. The officer who could and did pay got a better chance of high commands, with all the distinctions they bring, and got his chance at an earlier age. That was the system which we, who objected to Purchase, considered unjust to the poorer officer and injurious to the efficiency of the Service. Practically, there may have been alleviations; but in the main our argument was sound, and it was successful. But how is it under this Bill? Can an officer buy himself into higher rank or higher pay? No; all that he gets by exchange is an appointment exactly similar to that which he held before; and in point of fact he is rather a loser, for, if I understand the matter rightly, he goes to the bottom of his own rank. Does he stand in the way of anybody else's promotion? No; all he gains is to be quartered in a place which, for purely personal feelings, whether of health, family, or taste, he finds better suited to him than another. But, my Lords, this is not all. In the many discussions which were held between 1856 and 1872 on the Purchase system, those who opposed it, the Army reformers, were never tired of pointing to the non-Purchase corps—the Engineers and Artillery—and, they always argued—I think quite justly—that they got on perfectly well without Purchase. What was the answer made to that? Did anybody ever say—“Your argument does not apply; you are resting on a fallacy; you are assuming that which does not exist; these corps have the Purchase system in another form, because exchanges are allowed and money passes?” My Lords, nothing of the kind ever was said; nor could it be. Whether for praise or blame, everybody agreed as to the fact that in these corps Purchase did not exist. And I cannot understand how we are to be charged with the design of restoring it, when we simply aim at putting the rest of the Army on the footing on which these—the non-Purchase—corps stood before 1871. Even if a system of exchanges were like the Purchase system, likeness is not identity—you do not sentence a man without trial because he has the misfortune to have a relative who has been lately hanged. But the truth is that till this year, and except for the purpose of these debates, no likeness between the two was ever discovered, and the officers of the corps concerned will be the last persons to admit its existence. Now, my Lords, I come to what is, after all, the main issue before us—what will be the working of this measure, if it passes—what interests will it affect, and how will it affect them? My Lords, there are four distinct sets of persons to be considered. There are the officers who are willing to pay for exchanges; there are the officers who are glad to be paid; there are the non-commissioned officers and privates; and there is the public outside the Army, which is interested in its discipline and efficiency. I will deal with these classes separately. As to the officers who want to buy exchanges, it may be assumed that they are in favour of the Bill. It is quite certain that their interests are promoted by it. But, undoubtedly, they are a small minority—and that fact—if you look at the facts—is one of the strongest arguments for the measure. No one doubts that its passing is desired by officers generally. No one disputes that the great majority of officers in the Army are persons who, though not wholly dependent on their pay, are yet possessed of but small private means. Is it conceivable that a large body of educated and intelligent men, dealing with a matter which intimately concerns their professional life, and which they perfectly understand, should be not only not averse from, but eager and anxious for, the granting of a privilege which is to make against their interests, which is to sacrifice the advantage of the numerous poor officers to the comparatively small number of rich officers? That is an absurdity on the face of it. Whether they are right or wrong in the view they take you must admit that the class of officers who would be sellers and not buyers in these transactions desire to have the right of engaging in them restored; and the presumption, at least, is that they know what they are about. But why, if we come to reason on the matter, should they take any other view? What do they lose by permission being given to exchange on these terms? The transaction is purely voluntary. An officer who, in the chances of the service, has got appointed to a station where most officers are glad to be sent, cannot be compelled or induced to leave it. If he wishes to exchange, he may benefit his pocket; if he does not wish to exchange, he is where he was before this Bill passed. The only possible objection which can be put forward on behalf of this class—and it is one which they do not put forward for themselves—is, that it may seem to give an invidious advantage to wealth. And the question is, whether that purely fanciful feeling—confined, as I hope and believe in an Army like ours it is, to a very few—ought to be set against the substantial advantage of enabling a poor man to pay his debts, or to help his family, by shifting from a pleasant to an unpleasant quarter? The noble Lord says, we ought to hear nothing of poor officers or of rich officers; every one ought to be able to live on his pay. I should be heartily glad if that were possible. But this is not the case now, except in rare cases where the strictest economy is practised. To effect that object generally, it would be necessary to increase the pay of all classes of officers; and then all the economical policy of which we have heard so much during the last few years, and which we desire to maintain, would be scattered to the winds. Next, take the case of the private. It has been argued that he will be more dissatisfied than before with his condition when he sees that his officers have the power of exchanging out of disagreeable service while he is obliged to stay where he is sent. But those who argue in that way forget that the conditions of service in the two cases are different from the beginning. An officer can retire from the service when he likes. A private if he tries to do so is punished for deserting. There is room enough already for envy, if you suppose that feeling to exist; but the inferiority of the one position to the other is not aggravated by the mere fact that officers will be more free than before to make their own arrangements as to the place in which their duty shall be done. The position of the two classes, taking them as classes, remains what it was. But, my Lords, if no injury is done to officers or to privates by this Bill, is there none to the efficiency or discipline of the Service? That is the point on which most stress has been laid. It is assumed that the power of buying exchanges, however limited by regulation, will enable officers to make a plaything of the Service; will break up the Army into two classes—those who pay to stay at home and those who are paid to go abroad; that rich men will exchange into regiments where promotion is expected to be more rapid; and that competent officers preferring to stay in England or to return there will leave posts for which they are fitted and hand over their duty to men less competent to discharge it. I have tried to state these adverse criticisms fairly, and I will try to meet them. First, as to making a plaything of the Service. Surely, my Lords, it is a great mistake to argue as if it were mere fancy or the wish for pleasanter quarters that makes men desire to exchange. Exchanges may be matters of health or of family necessity. An officer may be perfectly competent to do his work in Europe, who is warned by his doctors that the Indian climate will kill him; or he may be fit to serve in India, but not to face a Canadian winter. What do you gain by driving such a man out of the Service? The Army loses a good officer and society gets a discontented idler, and yet you do drive him out of the Service if you do not allow him to exchange on the only terms on which an exchange from India may often be possible. Take, again, the case of an officer of independent means, married, and with a young family, whose regiment goes to India in time of profound peace. He cannot take his children with him. He runs considerable risk if he takes out his wife. He has the option of leaving them for five years or of quitting the Service. He likes the Service, but he is not dependent upon it, and rather than sacrifice his home he throws up his commission. Nobody can blame him—he is doing what he has a right to do; but what do you get by driving him to that determination? My Lords, there are many other reasons why officers may wish to change their regiments. One man has most of his friends in another regiment, and wishes to join them. One prefers to serve in a regiment which possibly his father commanded for many years. One has had some little unpleasantness with his brother officers, not reflecting on his character, but which makes a change better for all parties. One has a feeling of nationality, which makes him, as a Scotchman or an Irishman, prefer a Scotch or an Irish regiment. Surely, it is not to be said that motives of this kind are unreasonable or unnatural, or that in acting upon them a man is doing what is blameable. But I may be told, nobody objects to exchanges, it is only the paying for them that is objectionable. My answer is that if you forbid exchanges in all cases except where the respective situations are of exactly equal eligibility, you really do forbid them in the great majority of cases; and that has been so much felt that, as stated just now, the recent prohibition is relaxed to this extent—that any expense actually incurred in removal consequent on an exchange may be borne by the other party to the exchange. Surely that is a very fine distinction. A man is not to receive money for his own use or for his family requirements, but he is to receive repayment for his travelling expenses, fixed by some authority which must either exercise a very arbitrary discretion, or else—which is the more probable alternative—neglect its duty altogether. Is there no risk of evasion in such a rule? Are you sure that you can enforce it? Does it commend itself to man's reason—and, if not, is there not a constant tendency to evade, to treat as a dead letter, a regulation which is against the interests of both parties concerned, and the necessity or utility of which is not evident? But I come back from that. It is contended, as I said before, that if you encourage exchanges, a competent officer sent to a post which may be important is liable to be replaced by one less able. But as far as that argument applies at all it applies to exchange in any form. I presume that, whether this Bill passes or not, there will always be, as there is now, power to prohibit an exchange which for whatever reason is considered as not for the interest of the Service. While that power exists the objection which I am referring to disappears. If it ceased to exist, then, with or without this Bill, the military authorities would be left without the power which they ought to have. But, my Lords, we may safely trust in these matters to the action of those motives which ordinarily regulate human conduct. The officer who is most eager to put himself forward for any post where there is a chance of active employment is not the man who will do the work least well when it comes to him. Take two officers equally competent, but one of whom is anxious to get out to India because he thinks he may have a chance of seeing service there; and the other, being in India, is only eager to get home to his hunting and shooting and pleasant society in England—and I say the man who is eager for work is the better man to go out where there is a chance of distinction. The process is one of natural selection, and I do not see why you are to interfere with it. As to the other apprehension which has been expressed—that rich officers will exchange out of regiments where promotion is slow into others where it is rapid—I must speak, as a civilian, with reserve; but, though I have often heard that danger referred to, I have never seen proof that it is real, or had it explained to me how the thing is to be done. Who is to know beforehand that promotion will be slow in one regiment and quick in another? Are not these things very much matters of chance? Can they be foreseen and speculated upon? Will you find men ready to invest their money in a speculation of this kind, of which they, knowing the circumstances, know better than anybody the uncertainty? I hear it answered—"Oh, the agents will manage it;" and I admit that Army agents are an acute class, but they must be sharper than I give them credit for if they know who among the seniors of half-a-dozen regiments are going to die next year. They may think it probable that such and such an officer is thinking of retiring; but calculations of that kind are very apt to be mistaken, and they can have no monopoly of information in that respect. I remember a saying ascribed to an eminent Prime Minister long ago, that if he had been dishonest enough to speculate in the Funds with the supposed advantage of his official knowledge, he should certainly have lost his money; and I suspect those who trust to agents professing to have secret intelligence of the intentions of senior officers will come, sooner or later, to the same conclusion. My Lords, there is another class of objection with which I am bound to deal. I have heard it argued, if this system is good for the Army, why not for the Navy, why not for the Civil Service? My Lords, a more plausible fallacy never was uttered. The conditions of service in the British Army are utterly unlike those of the Navy or of the Civil Administration. In the Army, if a regiment moves, say, to India, every officer in it must go, or he must exchange, or he must leave the service. You have nothing analogous to that in the naval profession. You have not there, and you cannot have, anything like the regimental organization. A regiment is a permanent body; a ship's officers are a body brought together for a temporary purpose. Commands in the Navy are for short terms; and if an officer's health unfits him for tropical service, I apprehend that he would be able to decline a command without prejudicing his claims to employment elsewhere. There is, therefore, in the Navy no question of exchanges, and the discussion in which we are engaged could not take place in connection with that profession. The same thing may be said of the Civil Service. You have civilians, no doubt, serving in all parts of the world; but you have no class of men like lieutenants, or captains, or majors serving now in one part of the world, now in another, performing wherever they are exactly the same duties, holding exactly the same rank, and therefore interchangeable with one another. If you had such a class in the Civil Service I think it very likely indeed that the question of exchanges among them would arise. But you have no such class, and therefore that question does not arise. My Lords, I will not dwell on the merely declamatory argument—though much stress was laid on it “elsewhere”—that it is improper and unjust that a man should be able to escape by a mere money payment from the performance of irksome duty. Just look where that doctrine leads you. A private cleans his arms and accoutrements for himself; that is part of his duty. A cavalry soldier grooms his own horse; that is also part of his duty. Is not an officer escaping irksome duty by a payment of money when he employs his soldier servant to black his boots or brush his cloak or his groom to clean his horse? You cannot look at matters from that point of view. As long as the work is done, as long as it is done properly, as long as it costs the country no more, what does it matter to anybody except the parties concerned whether it is done by A or B, or in what proportions they share the doing of it between them? Recollect that the British Army is a very peculiar body. It is the only large Army in the world recruited on an exclusively voluntary principle; and that tells on its composition as regards officers as well as men, for with a conscript Army promotions from the ranks are easier. It is the only Army which is scattered over the whole face of the globe. Its officers are paid very little. But for the social position which their commission gives them, it may be said that they hardly get a fair day's wages for a fair day's work. You ought to be careful how you deal with the traditions and even with the prejudices of a body so composed. It is not a question of what is most agreeable to the officers, but of what is best for the State. Make the service distasteful and you will not get as good men, nor get them on the same terms. You might conceivably have a system under which all exchange was forbidden, and every officer was bound to go with his regiment wherever it went. But you must pay for it if you do. And at a moment when the gains of other professions are increasing, when money does not go as far as it formerly did, when the pay is, therefore, really less than before, measured by purchasing power; when you are very properly requiring higher qualifications from your officers, and putting heavier burdens of duty upon them, it does not seem wise to go out of your way to make military life unnecessarily harsh and repulsive to those who, with possibly a choice of careers before them, are doubting whether they shall enter it or not. My Lords, I do not wish to detain you further; but I have heard with surprise the language held. When on one side it has been pleaded that any abuses which the Bill did not absolutely render impossible might be checked by regulations, the answer has been—“We do not trust regulations. Parliament ought to rely on nothing except an Act of Parliament, and not take for granted that any abuse will be avoided which the law makes possible.” My Lords, do you act on that theory in any other branch of the public service? There is scarcely a limit to the mischief which those who hold administrative power might not do without breaking any law. They might turn all the clerks out of the Public Offices, and replace them by their own friends; they might recall Governors from the Colonies and diplomatists from abroad; they might throw the whole public service into confusion in a hundred ways. But nobody is afraid of their doing these things, because there is an unwritten as well as a written law—a law of custom and of opinion—a law enforced, not merely by individual conscience, but by Parliamentary criticism and the power of the Press. My Lords, is Parliament less vigilant than formerly? Is the Press less powerful? Are jobs more readily tolerated? You can answer those questions for yourselves. Depend upon it, if the country does not mean that the administration of the Army shall be jobbed—and it does not—abuses may be legally possible, but practically they will not be in question. If I could see in this Bill one-tenth of the evils and dangers that the noble Viscount (Viscount Cardwell) anticipates from it, I should be as little ready to support it as he is; but, as I believe those evils to be unreal and those dangers illusory, I ask you to give it a second reading.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, the same views and the same sentiments that have just been expressed by my noble Friend are those which will guide me in making the remarks which it is my desire to express to your Lordships. I am exceedingly anxious that it should be distinctly understood that I am about to make my statements upon strictly military grounds. I do not look upon this as a party question, and, as far as I am personally concerned, my sole desire is to speak as the exponent of the sentiment of the Army as I believe it to exist, and to elucidate some points in reference to the question which do not seem to be quite clearly understood, and with which, in my official capacity, it will become my duty to deal. Exchanges in themselves are certainly not acceptable to any of the authorities; and I entirely go with the view of the noble Viscount when he read the remarks of Lord Clyde, and referred to the evidence given by myself and others before the Royal Commission presided over by the noble Duke who sits behind him (the Duke of Somerset). On that occasion I said I objected to exchanges, and I entertain the same objection still. But I am bound to state frankly that it is utterly impossible to carry on the administration of the Army without great injustice, hardship, and, I believe, great injury to the public service unless exchanges are allowed. The noble Viscount himself admitted the principle of exchange when he specified the form in which exchanges should be effected. The object of this Bill is to alter that form, and the reason for it is that this form has been found extremely inconvenient and detrimental to the Army. I have said that I object to exchanges—I do so because I wish to maintain the regimental system, and have no desire to see officers moving about from one corps to another—I wish every officer to be attached to his own corps—but at the same time I am far from advising your Lordships to reject the arrangement proposed in this Bill. If the public or the officers of the Army have an idea that because this Bill is passed officers will come in shoals to ask for exchanges, I think they will find they have made a great mistake. When an officer asks for an exchange, the first thing which the Commander-in-Chief has to consider is the effect it would have on the public service—what there is in the applicant's position to justify it—whether it is desirable in the interests of the corps themselves that the exchange should be made—and whether it would injure any other officer's chances of promotion. If it is found that there is no special objection to it on that score, the next question is, does there seem to be sufficient ground to justify the officers in question exchanging—is there any reason for assuming that anything irregular is being done? Should anything of the sort be perceived, the military authorities will instantly refuse to sanction the exchange. The decision of this matter is, perhaps, the only arbitrary power which the military authorities possess. If they see that the interests of the public service do not justify an exchange, there is an end of it. The whole power of granting or refusing an exchange rests with them, and they are not required to give reasons for their decision. So that the question of exchanges is one of confidence or no confidence in the military authorities. I am satisfied that this was not in the mind of the opponents of this Bill—but I desire to point out that this is the logical result. So long as the military authorities thus watch jealously the interests of the public service I contend that this is as safe a measure as could well be devised. I can give my noble Friend an instance or two of the working of this system. An officer, who shall be nameless, was allowed three or four years ago to exchange for the purpose of returning home from serving in India. There was nothing in the circumstances of the case which did not justify the exchange being made. But, unfortunately for him, the very regiment which he had entered was subsequently ordered to India also, and on his applying again for permission to exchange that permission was refused. Why? Because the military authorities did not deem the proposed exchange justifiable under the new set of circumstances. The interests of other officers would have suffered. If the exchange in question had been refused, these officers would probably have left the Army and the country would have lost their services. I mention this case merely in order to show the care and attention with which every exchange is looked into. If I thought this Bill would introduce the question of compensation at anytime I should be as much averse to it as I am now favourable to it. But this is a matter which need not even be alluded to. We are now going on an entirely different principle, and we ought to put the idea of Purchase completely aside. As to its introducing the possibility of giving bonuses, to bring this forward at all as an argument against this Bill would almost imply that the military authorities were blind to the interests of the public service. I can assure your Lordships that no exchange would be allowed, unless the military authorities were perfectly satisfied that the public interest would not suffer, and that the desire on the part of the officers to exchange arose from other than pecuniary considerations. I think this Bill necessary. I admit the inconveniences attending exchanges, but I also know as a matter of fact that you cannot avoid them. It is a choice of evils. Therefore I say—"Accept this arrangement, which is calculated to meet the necessities of the case in a plain matter-of-fact way." I really believe that when once it is known and felt that exchanges are not to be worked to the extent that some people seem to imagine the question will soon find its level—officers will not be disposed to give money for what does not produce money. The question of exchanges formerly occupied a very different position from what it does now. It was all very well when rich men could exchange into a corps with a view to promotion, jumping over the heads of five or six poorer officers; exchanges had then a marketable value; but now this "leap-frog system" has entirely disappeared. Besides, the power of selection which is given to the Commander-in-Chief by the Abolition of Purchase Act will stand good to prevent anything in the shape of money passing to an extent that might be considered at all improper or even questionable. Under these circumstances, I confess I have a strong opinion that this measure should recommend itself to your Lordships' approval. And, as regards the officers of the Army, should you pass this Bill, I have no doubt the large majority—I believe the whole—of the officers will feel in a much more safe position as regards their interests if they are allowed on moderate conditions to exchange. I have heard this question argued in the interests of the poor officer; I agree in that view; I believe it is really a poor man's question—but, of course, for a different reason from that advanced. The officers who come to me and urge me to promote exchanges are poor men. When they are serving at home they find their pay in England so small that they would in many cases have to leave the Service if they could not go abroad again, where the pay is better. I believe the code of regulations which will be framed is such that the system may be carried out successfully. I do not know, my Lords, that I have much more to add. I have argued the matter in a purely military sense. I hope I have shown that my answers to questions put to me by the Royal Commission are quite consistent with my support of the present measure. And if your Lordships have that confidence in the military authorities, which I infer from your having given the Commander-in-Chief the power of selection, you may rest assured that no ill effects will result from carrying out this measure as proposed; while at the same time you will have a well-contented Army, with the assurance that in no respect has the profession retrograded from the passing of this measure.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET: My Lords, the illustrious Duke has spoken on this occasion, as he always does, without favouring either party, and with that earnest and anxious desire to promote the interests of the public service and the officers of the Army which has always distinguished him. Having heard his statements and read his evidence, as quoted by the noble Duke, I cannot help thinking that both are very satisfactory. He does not allow exchanges, except where they tend to the benefit of the public service and are consistent with justice to all the officers concerned. When, however, I look at the evidence before the Royal Commission, I must say I see a very different state of things—the evidence shows that underlying the system of exchanges there has grown up a practice of sale and purchase, even a market price. What do the officers say? They talk about their right to exchange. Captain Campbell, in reply to Question 432 says, "I had a right to exchange;" and to Question 434 he says, "I might make any pecuniary arrangements." Lieutenant-Colonel Bray, in answer to Question 554, says—

"The loss of the power of exchange was very great. (555) There was a certain market price. The market varied, and poor men were obliged to watch the market."

Captain Moffatt (596) "The right of exchange was a valuable consideration in the eyes of all officers." Captain Gonne (703) "I should have said to the agent,—'Find me an exchange as major to India.'"

(704) "Was that a thing which could be obtained by going into the market?—I have never known any one search for it in vain."

Captain Backhouse (2,827)—

"I had a right to exchange if I thought proper, receiving or paying money according to the part of the world in which my regiment was situated."

Lieutenant-Colonel Johnstone (907) speaks of the power of obtaining by exchange the command of a Line regiment, and (912) he says it was worth about £3,000. Colonel Burnaby says (1,114), large sums could be received by Cavalry officers exchanging to the Infantry. Captain Spottiswoode says—

(1,177) "Under the old system officers were always allowed to exchange to half-pay. Exchanges were not limited to regiments going abroad."

I might quote a great many more extracts to show that officers were still treating the question as a matter of right. But the illustrious Duke tells us that no officer has any right to exchange—he can only exchange where it is for the benefit of the public service; or at least, where it cannot be at all detrimental and where it is seen to be just to the other officers concerned. If that line be taken, of course many of the evils expected to arise from the system of exchanges will be done away with. They had grown up, no doubt, in connection with the Purchase system, which tainted everything connected with the service; but if exchanges were carried out strictly on the principle laid down by the illustrious Duke, I think this Bill may safely be allowed to pass; and for my part, I should be very sorry if, a Royal Commission having reported in its favour, the other House of Parliament having passed it by large majorities, and the whole Army being anxious for it, the House of Lords should oppose it. I admit the danger and difficulties of the question, but I say the illustrious Duke will be responsible for carrying it out, and I trust he will carry it out in the spirit in which he has spoken to-night, and that when hereafter a Committee looks into the question to see how the system of exchanges has worked under this measure they will be able to report that the principles of the illustrious Duke have been fully and fairly carried out.

LORD SANDHURST said, it was with great reluctance he rose to address their Lordships, because, as he had the honour to hold an executive office under the Crown, he approached the subject with considerable difficulty, and he had the misfortune to differ from the illustrious Duke on the cross-benches. The noble Duke who had last spoken (the Duke of Somerset) dwelt at considerable length on the dangers which beset this measure, but concluded by saying that, while admitting the risks to which the discipline of the Army might be exposed, he was yet prepared to vote for it. Under these circumstances, he (Lord Sandhurst), for one, could not follow the noble Duke into the Lobby. If this measure was attended with such risks, it was the bounden duty of those who agreed with the noble Viscount (Viscount Cardwell) by every means to oppose the Bill, and, if possible, to throw it out. The question did not rest on the point put before their Lordships by the illustrious Duke on the cross-benches. It was a question totally foreign to the responsibilities of the military authorities. The question was one of the morality of the Army—of the morality of the officers—whether they should be regulated by the same principle as regulated other professions, or should be invited to barter that principle for money considerations. In the year 1832, a great measure of reform became law. That was the first great step in this country towards educating the people in the true path of political morality. It was not merely an electoral reform; it was a declaration that the trust confided for the performance of a public duty should not be so corrupted or changed as to become a freehold, to be used for private purposes and private interests. What had we been saying during the last 40 years?

were again landed in a discussion of the principle of that measure. This, in his opinion, was a result greatly to be deplored. He could use no term less strong. That the present Bill would pass he entertained no doubt; but still noble Lords opposite ought to recollect that the question would not be settled by the passing of this Bill; and that when the Party now in Opposition were again on the other side of the House the question would certainly be re-opened, unless it could be shown on the most indisputable ground that the evil consequences they now feared had not been brought about. It had seldom been his lot to speak on a subject which had given him more pain than this. He was aware that he was opposing the wishes of the great majority of the officers of the Army. That was, of course, a disagreeable position to occupy; but it was his firm conviction that time would show that the concession now sought to be made to their wishes would be the greatest mischief and the greatest injury which had ever been done to them.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, his noble and gallant Friend had made a very serious statement with regard to officers exchanging in order to avoid dangerous service. He could not leave such a question unchallenged, and therefore he hoped his noble and gallant Friend would, by naming the regiments, and giving the date of the occurrence, give him an opportunity of seeing how the matter really stood.

LORD SANDHURST said, that as regarded officers leaving the regiment abroad at a time when the men might be suffering from sickness, he had already stated that he spoke hypothetically, but that the Bill before the House led directly to encouragement of such conduct.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND thought that the noble and gallant Lord ought to state the number of the regiment the officers of which he said had exchanged in order to avoid a dangerous service. He wished to impress upon the noble and gallant Lord that he ought to do one of two things—either to withdraw his assertion that any officers of any regiment in Her Majesty's Service had effected an exchange for the purpose of avoiding a dangerous service, or to give the name and number of the regiment referred to.

Lord Sandhurst

LORD SANDHURST said, with regard to the question put to him by the noble Duke, he (Lord Sandhurst) must remind their Lordships that he was most particular in saying that the officers to whom he referred, like the public, were at the time doubtless unconscious of the war which soon afterwards broke out, although such a contingency was considered imminent in official quarters at the time, and that the Government and the Horse Guards of course knew the reasons of their actions. He was talking of what took place some 30 years ago, when sailing ships were the only means for the conveyance of troops, and when, of course, the communications between distant countries were greatly more tedious than at present. It was a fact that within a year and a quarter after leaving for India the regiment to which he alluded had to engage with the enemy on the North Western frontiers.

LORD PENZANCE said, that, as one of the three Commissioners on whose recommendations the Bill was founded, he hoped the few observations he had to make would prove of a more tranquilizing nature than those which had fallen from those noble Lords who were more directly interested in the question than he was. He did not complain of the terms in which the noble Viscount (Viscount Cardwell), who did him the honour of placing him on the Commission, had spoken of the way in which the Commissioners had discharged their duty; nor did he complain of their being styled in "another place," "distinguished and amiable persons," though everybody knew what that meant in such a connection. It was true that the Commissioners were three civilians. They had no interest in the matter, and as little knowledge of it—speaking for himself, at least, he would admit he had no knowledge of it at all. Well, the Commissioners were authorized to investigate the question, and to ascertain how far the complaints of the officers could, without injury to the public service, be met by withdrawing the restrictions which had been placed on their exchanges. It had been said that the Commissioners exceeded their Instructions. He was sorry if they did so. They certainly did not desire, in their inquiry, to travel over any region where they were not authorized to place their feet; certainly, they had no desire to carry their inquiries beyond the limits assigned to them; and it appeared to them their duty to carry their investigations to the extent to which they did carry it. The noble Viscount read a portion of the Commission under which they were appointed. He (Lord Penzance) begged leave to read another passage—because it was a passage that, in their humble judgment, thrust upon them the duty of investigating the subject of exchanges. The Commission recited that certain officers had alleged certain grievances—

“And whereas an humble Address has been presented to us by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled praying us to issue our Royal Commission for inquiry into the allegations of the said Officers.

“Now we appoint you our Commissioners”—for what?—“for the purpose of examining the allegations contained in the Memorials before referred to.”

Those Memorials differed very much. Some memorials laid great stress upon one complaint, and some upon another; but one and all put forward as a great grievance the interference with the free right of exchange. Therefore, if the Commissioners were to examine the allegations in the Memorials, it became their first duty to take the evidence of a large body of officers on that question, and they accordingly did so. But, said the noble Viscount, what the Commissioners were appointed to do was to see whether there were any grievances that could be compensated by a money payment. The Commissioners considered that question; but he (Lord Penzance) thought very little reflection would show any Member of the House that a money compensation for the loss of the free right of exchange was simply impossible. Could it be said in any one individual case that an officer in the course of a certain number of years would exchange with somebody else under the system of exchange? How, then, could they estimate the compensation in such a case for the loss of the right of exchange. They were, therefore, compelled either to pass over this particular grievance, or to take the course they did take with respect to it. After examining the allegations in the Memorials the Commissioners found that the officers had a real grievance with reference to exchange. He was sorry if the Commissioners exceeded their Instructions. They had no desire to do so; but to that hour he had not heard how they practically could have done anything else. The complaints of the officers were based upon this—they said they had entered the Army when certain facilities were open, and some complained that they were ordered to a foreign station, where their health did not enable them to carry on their duties. But the majority of the officers who complained were officers of the poorer class so called, who had always looked forward to this right of exchange which they had always practically enjoyed. The noble Duke behind him read evidence to show that there was no such right; but it was the practice—and the officers therefore complained that that practice was abolished by the Warrant issued on the subject. Let him remind their Lordships what the system of Purchase was—for it was much misunderstood out-of-doors. It was, in truth, simply a system of retirement, the retiring officer receiving a sum of money from the officer who succeeded him. The inequality which the system created between the rich and the poor was by no means the whole thing. No doubt, there were officers who could not purchase a step; but those were the very men who complained loudest of the abolition of Purchase. No doubt, other men went over their heads; but then they remained until they got to the top of their rank, and then when a vacancy occurred they took it without Purchase. This step they could turn to money account, and there were instances in which men who had risen from the ranks in this way got some thousands of pounds on their retirement. Well, then the question arose in the minds of the Commissioners, whether the abolition of Purchase made new Regulations, as to paying for exchanges, necessary. The Commissioners were resolved that nothing ought to be done under the Commission that tended in any way to restore the system of Purchase. It was an objection to Purchase—and an objection which, to his mind, was fatal to it—that under that system every officer had, as it were, a vested right to promotion on certain terms of payment. He had a right to buy a seniority upon its becoming vacant. The authorities were perpetually tied by those vested interests in the selection they wished to make of

The Commissioners were resolved that nothing ought to be done under the Commission that tended in any way to restore the system of Purchase. It was an objection to Purchase—and an objection which, to his mind, was fatal to it—that under that system every officer had, as it were, a vested right to promotion on certain terms of payment. He had a right to buy a seniority upon its becoming vacant. The authorities were perpetually tied by those vested interests in the selection they wished to make of men whom they wished to promote. In the Artillery and Engineers, which were non-Purchase corps, a system of exchanging similar to that contemplated by the present Bill had long existed, without tending, in the slightest degree, to call into existence a practice of purchasing commissions such as that which the late Government passed a Bill to abolish. It was not fair, therefore, to say either that the measure now before their Lordships would re-enact Purchase or call it into existence where it had previously been unknown. The Bill would not enable officers to obtain anything which they could exchange for money; it would simply put it within the power of officers to exchange precisely similar functions, with the sole difference that those functions would be discharged in countries other than those in which they would have been discharged if the exchanges had not been effected. With regard to the broad question which was constantly raised in discussions upon the present Bill, he had no hesitation in expressing his opinion that exchanges were beneficial, not in the abstract, but as affording an opportunity of choosing the least of two evils, one of which must of necessity exist. It had been urged that this measure was a retrograde proposal as compared with the Brokers Act; but it seemed to be forgotten that that Act permitted the exchange of commissions, subject to the condition that no more money should pass than was to be fixed by the Queen's Regulations. No such Regulations were, in fact, ever drawn up, and the present Bill would simply carry into effect that which would have been done by the Brokers Act if the necessary Regulations had been drawn up subsequent to its enactment. The present Bill would restrict the money payment on an exchange being effected to the sum necessary to defray the travelling expenses of the officer accepting the exchange. The change that the Commissioners proposed amounted to no more than this—they put it in the power of the illustrious Duke the Commander-in-Chief and the Army authorities to sanction exchanges in certain cases where it might seem desirable. What, then, was the objection to the Bill? If the power of permitting officers to exchange on payment of expenses was sufficient to induce them to exchange, why should they suppose that larger sums would pass? Officers in the Army were not, as a rule, so rich that they paid more for anything they wished than the sum prescribed by law. One of two things was certain, either that the sum to be paid was a real restriction, or that it was not; but no doubt, practically speaking, this payment did act as a restriction on exchange between officers. He had seen a statement by a person who seemed to have a practical knowledge of the question, and who remarked that it was easy for persons to say that they did not object to exchanges, but only to the passing of money for exchanges. When one regiment was going out to India another might be coming home, and many officers of the regiment ordered home who had contracted ties in India might be not only willing but anxious to remain where they were, while some of those who happened to be enrolled in the list of the officers of the regiment ordered out might have an equal desire to be stationed at home. In such a case why should not an arrangement for mutual convenience be sanctioned? The opponents of the measure indulged in prophecies as to what would happen under its operation; but they seemed altogether to forget that exchanges were no innovation, but had existed for 100, or, for aught he knew, 200 years. It was said that the rich officers would live in comfortable quarters, while the hardships of the service would be left to their poorer brethren. But if such a thing was likely to happen it would have happened already, and who could say that it had? Again, it was said that the Regulations controlling exchanges could not be relied on. But they had the same guarantee on that head, as they had for the fulfilment of other Regulations of the Service. As for the purchase of promotion, such a thing might have been possible under the old system; but it was impossible now when there was no right of succession to any vacancy, the right of selection being vested in the Commander-in-Chief. The argument that an inferior man might exchange into a position for which he was unfit, was also fallacious; for, the Commander-in-Chief having the right of selection, it was absurd to suppose that he would with one hand appoint a properly-qualified officer to a particular post, and then with his other sanction the substitution of an officer who was incompetent. It was said the officers of a regiment might "make a purse" to induce the senior officer to retire, and thus give them an opportunity for advancement. But that was a thing which had never been done, and what ground had they, therefore, for believing that it would be done in future? He came now to what might be called the sentimental side of the question. They had heard a good deal about a "degrading traffic," "higgling and huckstering," and so on. It was said "there were three things which ought not to be bought or sold—the virtue of a woman, the integrity of a statesman, and the honour of a soldier." Now, if that meant anything, it meant that the honour of the Army was compromised in this question, and that if exchanges were allowed the honour of the Army was impugned. That was a statement so alarming that one almost shrunk from exposing it. What said experience on the matter? Had the honour of the Army suffered from the Exchange system? It was the first time he had ever heard of it. Then it was said the morality of the Army would suffer; if this "higgling and huckstering" system were allowed to go on, officers would become so degraded in the eyes of the soldiers they would no longer care for them. Had this ever happened? Was that the spirit evinced in the lesson taught at Inkerman? The moment they came to look back to experience these delusions were entirely dissipated. Those who used these arguments substituted prophecy for the past and imagination for experience. He hoped their Lordships would deal with this question as one of a practical nature. It was of supreme importance to the State that the Army should be satisfied and efficient; and therefore it was a matter that should be treated on purely common-sense principles. If it was once affirmed with success that the payment of money was dishonourable, then it was immaterial whether officers were paid sufficient to cover their expenses, as at present, or something more. An accusation of having made a mistake as to military affairs would not have troubled him; but when he was told that he had recommended a course which tarnished the honour of the Army, he was not inclined to subscribe to this new definition of honour, which depended upon whether they paid travelling expenses or something besides. He had two regrets on the present occasion—first, that in dealing with this question he found himself opposed to those who were around him, and the other was that the debates in that and the other House of Parliament might create some amount of irritation in the officers of the Army; but he was satisfied that in the long run they would find that, whatever course it was necessary to take, the interests and honour of the Army would be safe and clear in the hands of both sides of the Houses of Parliament.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he had listened with great interest to the noble and learned Lord's defence of the Royal Commission of which he had been a distinguished Member. The noble and learned Lord would forgive him if he told him that he could not help feeling that his language was that of one who sought to extenuate an indiscretion rather than to repel an accusation. The Order of Reference was perfectly clear, and he could not see that any other interpretation could be applied to it than that of his noble Friend the noble Viscount. The Commissioners were required to report to the Crown whether any of the grievances alleged by the officers were such as should be compensated upon the principle of the Army Regulation Act. The principle of that Act was pecuniary compensation for a pecuniary loss, and who could ever have supposed that a Commission limited by such a reference as that would recommend, not compensation for the loss of the abolished right, but the restoration of the right itself—a right which, if not identical with those of which the Act assumed the abolition, was, at all events, very closely related to them. Nor could he persuade himself that the Commissioners themselves were unconscious of this. If he turned to their Report, what did he find? Every line of it which referred to the matter of exchanges breathed diffidence and doubt. The Commissioners, after enumerating the dangers apprehended by those who objected to all pecuniary bargaining between officers, stated—

"We are not satisfied that there is any real danger of this, but we are satisfied, from the evidence before us, that the return to the old practice of exchanges would be very acceptable to the Army."

that other sickly officers, equally or more deserving, would be kept in India, because they would not have money enough to pay the price in the Exchange market. But what did the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs tell the House? He said this was a question between two officers, A and B; it suited A and it suited B, and therefore the Government had nothing at all to say to it; the transaction was purely a voluntary one, and nobody was the worse for it. But there were surely numerous instances of purely voluntary transactions between parties which were detrimental to the highest interests of society, although, as far as the parties themselves were concerned, they might be advantageous or useful in the highest degree. Take a case of which the House had lately heard a good deal—the case of a simoniacal bargain in the Church. A patron might make a corrupt and illegal contract with a clergyman; the clergyman might be perfectly well fitted for the duties of the cure; the patron might spend the price received in building a school, or as a marriage portion for his daughter. This was a purely voluntary transaction, and its immediate results were beneficial to all parties, and yet it was one which we should certainly not wish to encourage by legislation. Not long ago there was a brisk traffic in Parliamentary boroughs, and the only way in which a man who did not wish to stand under an obligation to another could enter Parliament, was very often by purchasing a seat. Sir Samuel Romilly, for instance, entered the House of Commons in that way, and the House gained very much by his admission to its ranks. And yet no one would ever have proposed the introduction of a measure for stimulating the traffic in rotten boroughs. In his opinion, the results of the Bill would be two-fold, and the first result would be this—that whereas the service of the Queen involved, perhaps, more than military service in any other country in the world, rough places and smooth, officers who were able to buy exchanges would gravitate to the smooth places and officers who were obliged to sell would gravitate to the rough. His Royal Highness, when before the Duke of Somerset's Commission, in 1857 (Question 4,194), spoke of the English Army as one

"Scattered over the face of the globe, some performing very painful and disagreeable duties, not much known to the public, and others performing much more agreeable duties, but which come more under the notice of the public."

Nobody could question the accuracy of that statement; and the result of this Bill would be that under the ordinary laws of supply and demand the rich officer would get more than his fair share of the agreeable duties which would bring him under the notice of the Crown, while the poor officer would get the work which was not only more "painful and disagreeable," but less in evidence, and less likely to be "noticed" by the public and by his superiors. It was said that this state of things would not be new, for exchanges had been before and would be again. But he could not admit the force of that statement. The military authorities said now—"Find a substitute, and if you can do so we will not be so pedantic as to prevent you from paying the legitimate expenses of the transaction." But under this Bill they would say—"You want to quit a disagreeable place in which you serve the Queen. Now we give you carte blanche to go into the market and buy a substitute." The Royal Commissioners said that there were many good officers with slender means, who would be willing to serve in India or elsewhere for a consideration. What was that but saying, Ibit eo quo vis, qui zonam perdidit. Now, he should like to remind the House what those duties were which would in nine cases out of ten be avoided by officers buying their exchange out of one regiment into another. Foreign service, now that the troops had been withdrawn from the Colonies, meant, speaking generally, service in India. The duties of the English officer in India might be painful and disagreeable, but he could not conceive a moment more important in the career of a young officer than that in which he found himself for the first time serving Her Majesty in Her Indian dominions. There was a country of 1,000,000 square miles, with a native population numbering some 200,000,000, kept in control by 60,000 or 70,000 English troops. Every part of the country was consecrated by memories of the great men who had won our Empire and held it afterwards; the colours of his regiment very likely bore upon them the names of the victories which they had achieved. Everything conspired to make an officer proud of the Service and the career on which he was entering. Were they at that moment to allow a Mephistopheles in the shape of an army agent to come forward, and by some tempting proposal to induce him to exchange that glorious service in India for an uneventful life in an English cathedral town? These, then, would be some of the effects of the Bill. But it would have others not less mischievous. Under the Bill it would come to pass that whereas some corps possessed exceptional prestige and popularity, both those things would henceforth be expressed in terms of money, for the purpose of the sale and purchase of exchanges. This proposition was stated in his evidence by Colonel Burnaby with the most cynical frankness. He spoke of the custom of selling the intrinsic value of the prestige of commissions in the more privileged regiments, such as the Guards, Household Cavalry, Heavy Cavalry, not quartered in India, and Light Cavalry. According to this gallant officer, it would appear that the prestige and popularity attaching to commissions in certain regiments were to be used for the inglorious object of providing for the necessities of officers who happened to be in embarrassed circumstances. Observe how this would work. The late Government hoped to establish a local connection between the English Army and particular localities. But if a sub-lieutenant in the Militia got a commission in the county regiment, he might by-and-by convert it, if the regiment happened to be a popular one, into a sum of money wherewith to pay his debts, and the intention of the military authorities in posting him to a particular regiment would be frustrated. These evils were, at all events, possible. The safeguard proposed was that the military authorities would prevent these things. But were the military authorities always able to prevent abuses under the old system? The late Mr. Higgins, who was examined at great length before the Purchase Commission, referred to the case of the 43rd Regiment, which went to the Cape, and then on to India—

“It was a Light Infantry regiment, and was considered to be a very good regiment; when it went to India there were eight or nine sons of Peers in it, but in about 18 months after it had been there only one son of a Peer remained in it, and he had got an S attached to his name, having got on the Staff somewhere. I then looked back to see what had become of those men who had thus evaded the wish of the Horse Guards that they should take their tour of Indian duty, and I found that nearly everyone of them had fared much better by returning home than if he had remained with the regiment.”

Could anything be more mischievous than that this kind of impression should obtain in the Army or in the public mind? The same witness continued—

“I think that the abolition of the system of exchanging would be beneficial, because the way in which you occasionally see an officer with good interest manage to dodge his way upwards by exchanging from one regiment into another is most scandalous. Civilians cannot understand it. I recollect perfectly one man on the Staff whom I met in Dublin, who had exchanged so often that it had become quite a joke; when his friends asked him what regiment he was in, he used to call his servant and say, ‘What regiment are we in now?’ He was a man of very good interest, or he could not have done it.”

“The hardest work as well as the most dangerous work is done by poor men.”

But the Report of the Duke of Somerset's Commission was most explicit upon this point. The Commissioners distinctly admitted the inability of the War Department to keep these practices within limits—

“Exchanges from one regiment to another,” the Commissioners said, “and sales to officers on half-pay, facilitate an evasion of the Regulations which the higher authorities of the Army are unable to prevent.”

The noble and learned Lord (Lord Penzance) said that no mischief resulted from the old system of exchanges, and that for this reason no mischief was likely to result if this Bill became law. But it must be remembered that the Bill would do more than restore the old system. It would introduce the purchase and sale of exchanges into a non-purchase Army, which was a widely different thing from the old system. It would deliberately consecrate, with all the solemnity of an Act of Parliament, a system never yet recognized by the law of the land; and this being so, their Lordships must not delude themselves into the belief that they were simply reverting to the state of things which existed before the passing of the Army Regulation Bill. Noble Lords on this side of the House had been severely taken to task for stating their apprehension that this measure would affect the honour of the British Army. Now, he did not wish to speak lightly of the honour of the British Army. In every calling, however, and in every profession, there was a standard of honour based not only upon unchangeable moral precepts, but upon other considerations much more variable and conventional. In no profession was this more true than of the British Army; and he feared that if their Lordships allowed it to go forth that officers of the Army, when called upon to perform painful and disagreeable duties in out-of-the-way parts of the world, might avoid these duties by paying poorer men to perform them, the standard of honour within the British Army, in so far as it was a conventional standard, would be appreciably lowered, while the estimation in which that Army was held, particularly by those classes from which its ranks were filled, would suffer, and suffer materially. He feared that their Lordships were about to pass a measure which he could not but regard as likely to prove a serious misfortune to the Army and to the country. He was, however, not without hope that such a law would not be allowed permanently to disfigure the statute book; and if, at some future time, no matter how distant, the House was called upon to re-consider this question, their Lordships would be reminded of the solemn protest which those who sat near him would, at the termination of the debate, record against the passing of the Bill.

EARL CADOGAN would venture to say that many of the questions imported into this discussion by the opponents of the Bill did not come within the four corners of the measure. For example, a large portion of the arguments against the Bill were directed against the revival of the Purchase system. Everyone seemed agreed that, as the illustrious Duke had said, exchanges were indispensable to our Army; but as to the re-establishment of Purchase, if he (Earl Cadogan) thought this measure would lead directly or indirectly to such a result, he should decline to support it. It was said that, wherever money passed, a purchase and sale were intended. But exchange and purchase differed materially. In purchase under the old system a new office was acquired and a new emolument; whereas, in paying for an exchange you acquired neither of these things. Then it was contended that you might purchase not promotion, but the prospect of promotion. Since the abolition of Purchase, however, there was no certain prospect of promotion. It was now a system of seniority tempered by selection. But men would hardly purchase when there could be no certainty of obtaining the promotion desired. Mr. O'Dowd stated that with ordinary vigilance on the part of the authorities the system of exchanges now proposed would not be liable to abuse under the non-purchase system. Considering the recommendation of the Commissioners, the Government were bound to take action in some manner, and he did not see how they could have done so better than by preparing the present Bill. The members of a noble profession had been censured in no measured terms for their desire to see this Bill pass into law, and one of the noble Lords who had taken part in the debate seemed to think that the mere name of money would be enough to make officers in the British Army lose all sense of honour and patriotism. He, however, altogether denied that that would be the case. In order to dispose of the argument that an officer would have a vested right in whatever station he obtained under an exchange, he might mention the case of a lieutenant in the 35th Foot, who in 1845 obtained leave to exchange with a junior officer when his regiment was going to Mauritius. The money was paid; but news arrived soon afterwards of disturbances in Madagascar, and the result was that the lieutenant sailed in the same ship with the officer to whom he had paid the money for the exchange. If the Bill merely allowed liberty of exchange without supervision, it might be open to grave objections; but he felt sure that proper regulations would be made, and entertained no doubt whatever that they would be enforced. He thought that in framing the Bill every care had been taken to guard against the evils its opponents apprehended would arise from its operation, and he should therefore support the second reading.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, my noble and learned Friend who spoke from this side of the House in favour of the Bill (Lord Penzance) said, he was induced to interpose in this debate in order to restore it to calmness. My Lords, I must say I think this debate has been on the whole conducted, not only with great ability, but with perfect moderation and good temper; and certainly I shall endeavour not to use any exaggerated language. I confess I have been wholly unconvinced, even by the able argument of my noble and learned Friend, that the Bill will not lead to evil and injurious results. Both sides are agreed, as I understand, that under certain conditions exchanges may be tolerated and permitted. We are both agreed that there may be many circumstances under which it is a matter of perfect indifference to the public service whether a given officer serves in this regiment or in that. Indeed, my noble Friend behind me (Viscount Cardwell) himself made Regulations for the purpose of facilitating exchanges wherever they were considered to be legitimate. I admit, therefore, with my noble and learned Friend, that we have no right to use any arguments which imply that exchanges must necessarily be mischievous; but you have no right, on the other hand, to use any arguments which imply that this Bill is necessary under existing circumstances—because you have yourselves admitted that exchanges are perfectly free on condition that they cost nothing more than the actual expenses incurred. It has been argued that the introduction of sale and purchase into the system of exchanges will make no difference in the conditions of the case. Now, I listened attentively to the speech made by the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond) in opening his case to-night, and I think I am correct in saying that he adduced no evidence whatever to show either that the Bill would make no change or only a slight one, or that the measure was necessary in the interests of the public service. If it be so, there is no great object in passing the Bill. The only argument which the noble Duke brought forward was that it was exceedingly inconvenient for an officer in the War Office to draw up a schedule of expenses—it was to get rid of that inconvenience and for no other reason that he advocated the Bill. Yet the noble Duke was not wholly consistent in his argument, for he said—

“If your Lordships think the importance of this Bill is to be measured by its length and the number of its clauses, you will be much mistaken, but it will contribute materially to the loyalty and contentment of the Army.”

It is plain, however, that this Bill is intended to effect important alterations in the system of exchanges, and that it will introduce a new motive for exchanging. At present exchanges are regulated by the personal convenience or the health of the officers, and they are strictly subject to the conditions imposed by the War Office; but henceforth they are to be regulated by the question of money and price. The illustrious Duke on the cross-benches spoke as if the Bill would make hardly any change at all; but, if so, why did the officers attach so much importance to the passing of the measure? They wished it to pass because, in the language used by Mr. Disraeli in the other House of Parliament, it would stimulate exchanges. Then, I ask, is it consistent with the public service that exchanges should be artificially stimulated by being made the subject of sale and purchase? I cannot understand how it is consistent with the argument used and quoted from the evidence of the illustrious Duke on former occasions that exchanges are in themselves an evil, and that the regimental system of the British Army consists essentially in the connection—the almost family connection—between the officers of a regiment and their men; and that the discipline and efficiency of the Army would be injuriously affected by a breaking up of that system. But this Bill will make the officers a fluctuating body, and thus the regimental system will lose its distinctive advantage. We are bound in the interest of the public service to see that riches as such shall not give a great and fatal advantage to the rich over the poor. An argument used by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary to-night, which I have often heard “elsewhere,” has a certain force; and it is this that this Bill, whatever you may say of it, is popular with the poorer officers. To a large extent I believe that is true. The reason of it is plain. The poorer officer who has his exchange to sell will be no doubt a gainer by this Bill; but when he comes to buy his exchange he will be a loser by the exchange—because this Bill will unquestionably raise the price of exchanges. Each man, it is true, trusts to his own luck, and does not look to the latter contingency. But a poor man will have little chance of exchanging from an unhealthy climate, for undoubtedly the Bill will have the effect of raising the price. This is the way in which it is proposed to consult the interests of the poorer officers of the Army. But it is said that the Regulations will prevent mischief from arising. My Lords, I do not think it will be possible for the illustrious Duke by any Regulations he may make to prevent the making up of purses by officers to induce officers who are before them to exchange into other regiments. This Bill will, for the first time, formally give the sanction of Parliament to the doctrine that money is to be made by the sale of exchanges of posts in the Army. I quite admit that this Bill will not re-introduce the old system of Purchase;—it will not enable one officer to buy over the head of another; but this it will do—it will introduce a sense of property among officers in the positions which they hold in the Army; and I am bound to say that that argument seemed greatly strengthened by the speech of the noble Earl the Foreign Secretary. The most stringent regulations in the old Indian Army system, and as to our own Regulation prices, could not prevent the evils arising against which they were intended to guard, nor will they do so in the present instance. Our officers, as a body, are poorly paid; and instead of passing a Bill to enable the poorer officers to increase their incomes by exchange, I think it would be infinitely preferable to give them better pay. I most heartily agree with my noble Friend (Viscount Cardwell) in desiring that this Bill should be rejected by this House. I know very well that is a conclusion we cannot hope to attain. I believe this Bill will pass, and I can only say I earnestly trust it will never become necessary to retrace the step. I think it would be most unbecoming and most injurious to the public service if we on this side of the House should hold out any threats that when changes of Government occur in the course of time we shall do this and the other. I trust we are not actuated by a desire to do anything that is not for the good of the officers and the welfare of the Army. If our predictions are undeserved and it proves that the mere regulations of the War Office can prevent the continuous pressure which arises from the accumulation of personal and private interests we shall be happy in the failure of our anticipations. But if it shall be found, on the other hand, that this system leads to underhand negotiations which it is impossible for you to oversee or to suppress, then unquestionably there will be changes made—and made probably with the authority of the Crown and Parliament—in order to meet the necessities of the case. I regret this because I think it important above all things that this question should be permanently settled in order that in the Army a feeling of contentment may spring up, based upon the conviction that a final settlement has been reached. I cannot see that this feeling is likely to arise from the passing of the present Bill; but, at the same time, I repeat my hope that our prophecies may prove unfounded.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE supported the Bill, which he regarded as a measure of justice to the officers of the Army, and therefore likely to produce a feeling of contentment. Nothing could be more injurious to the Service than to permit a spirit of discontent to continue in existence when it could be removed by adopting a course that would confer a boon upon a large class, and, at the same time, tend to the advantage of the Service. The subject had been very carefully considered by a body of most able and impartial Commissioners, and the time that had since elapsed had enabled the Government to embody their recommendations in the present measure. He hoped it would pass. In his opinion, young men would hesitate to join the Army if exchanges were not allowed.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, although this debate has already extended to a considerable length, perhaps you will bear with me while I make a few observations in defence of the vote which I intend to give this evening. I paid particular attention to the speeches made by my two noble Friends the Members of Her Majesty's Government, and I gather that, in their opinion, exchanges are so necessary and so beneficial that it is not sufficient they should be permitted under proper supervision, but that an additional stimulus should be applied in the shape of sums of money to be paid by the richer to the poorer officers. I also gathered that the agencies to which they trust for the proper administration of the system are an inquiry

order to restore it to calmness. My Lords, I must say I think this debate has been on the whole conducted, not only with great ability, but with perfect moderation and good temper; and certainly I shall endeavour not to use any exaggerated language. I paid particular attention to the speeches made by my two noble Friends the Members of Her Majesty's Government, and I gather that, in their opinion, exchanges are so necessary and so beneficial that it is not sufficient they should be permitted under proper supervision, but that an additional stimulus should be applied in the shape of sums of money to be paid by the richer to the poorer officers. I also gathered that the agencies to which they trust for the proper administration of the system are an inquiry on the one hand, and the discretion of the military authorities on the other. The noble and learned Lord (Lord Penzance) seemed to think we were disposed to make attacks upon him and his Colleagues on the Royal Commission. So far as I am concerned I entirely disclaim any such intention. I think it would be most unjust and excessively ungrateful on the part of those who had the honour to represent the late Government in this House to make attacks on the gentlemen who at the request of that Government, and in deference to the command of the Queen, undertook an onerous and in some respects an invidious duty. I may, perhaps, recall the circumstances under which that Commission was issued. Very loud complaints were made by officers that they were ill-treated under the new Army Regulations. Your Lordships were so impressed with the justice of those complaints that you agreed to an Address to the Queen for the issue of a Commission of Inquiry. That Commission was appointed, not on the merits of the case, but from a sincere respect for your Lordships who voted for the Address in such large numbers, and from an earnest wish to do something towards soothing the feelings in the officers of the Army. The Commission agreed in the main with the late Government; but a question arises as to their authority to make the particular recommendations on which the Bill is founded. My noble and learned Friend says he came to the inquiry perfectly ignorant of the subject before him. Well, what persons were examined before the Commission? A series of officers, some of the highest distinction, who all acted really as counsel for exchanges, and not one word of evidence was given the other way:—so that it is not remarkable if the noble and learned Lord and his Colleagues, admirably adapted though they were to consider the points referred to them, should in a matter concerning the discipline of the Army have made a mistake. The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) says you must do one of two things—you must either vote for this Bill or declare your belief in the incompetency of the military authorities and that in that case the sooner they are changed the better. Now, I admit that. I do not know any one who so well understands all the different parts of the Army as the illustrious Duke; I do not know one who has worked with greater zeal and anxiety to promote its efficiency and welfare; but because he tells us that he is determined to watch over the system of exchanges with the same strictness he has hitherto displayed—because he tells us he will maintain that strictness to the uttermost—is that any reason why I should vote for a Bill which is not limited to the duration of the illustrious Duke's possession of office, but establishes a principle which I think will be most injurious for the future? And with regard to confidence in the military authorities, I must say it is much more likely that the Government will fail in that confidence than that we on this side should do so. It has already been remarked that the Prime Minister tells us it is necessary to encourage and stimulate exchanges; but what says the illustrious Duke? He says that exchanges are detrimental in themselves to the Army, following the Duke of Wellington, Viscount Hardinge, and Lord Clyde, whose remarkable evidence was quoted to your Lordships by my noble Friend the noble Viscount (Viscount Cardwell). But the illustrious Duke went still further, for he said that he should watch the system most strictly, and that it was not his intention that more exchanges should take place than have been made hitherto; and he said he should inquire whether excessive sums of money were paid—although that is contrary to the declaration of the Secretary for War that he was determined to know nothing as to whether the sums were large or small. The noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs said, as one of his principal arguments in favour of the Bill, that officers were poor, and he looked to the system of exchanges as a mode of remunerating them. Now, first of all, I hold that system of remuneration is as bad as any one can conceive, but what comes of that argument if the illustrious Duke is to keep the number of exchanges the same as at present? The noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) referred to the opinion of "the Intelligent Foreigner." Now, I do not know of any foreign Army except the French which tolerates exchanges, and in the French Army practically the resemblance is much greater to the system of my noble Friend the noble Viscount than to that which it is now proposed to substitute. It is, I know, the opinion of some of the most eminent French military authorities that the system of exchanges in the French Army had in the last war a very bad effect; it destroyed to a very great degree the esprit de corps of the French regiments. My Lords, we do not object to exchanges. We have sanctioned exchanges in various departments of the Public Service. The only question is, whether in the Army alone the passing of money should be legalized between officers in order to promote exchanges. I have at different periods held various offices in the State, as Secretary for the Colonies, Foreign Minister, and President of the Council. I have often been applied to to sanction exchanges, and my answer has always been—"You have been a good officer; when there is a vacancy I will take care to put the new man in your place and you in a more southern district." But, what would have been my feelings if I had learnt that £500 had been pocketed by either of the parties on the occasion of the exchange? The noble and learned Lord (Lord Penzance) stated that these persons had established a grievance, and the only alternative the Commission had was either to ignore the grievances of the officers or to make the recommendation they did. I do not think that was the only alternative. If it were a pecuniary grievance it would have been easy to recommend a money compensation, or another thing which might be perhaps more difficult—that this compensation should be continued to the officers who had entered the Service before Purchase was abolished. The noble and learned Lord repelled with some indignation the idea that the Commissioners recommended a course which would be pernicious to the British Army; and in the only part of his speech in which there was any warmth referred to the word "huckstering" as applied to officers who might take advantage of this system. He said that a thing which had not happened for 100 years was not likely to occur in the future. But my noble Friend the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) read just now a sentence from a noble Lord of high authority on the subject, saying how impossible it was for the military authorities to check abuses under the circumstances referred to. But in the very sentence before I find such words as these—

"A mercenary spirit is created in men whose guiding principle should be a nice sense of honour and a loyal attachment to the Service."

These are words which I do not wish to adopt; but coming from such high authority, they do not justify the noble and learned Lord in what he has said. Now, with regard to the noble profession of arms, I venture to say that there is no one who has more respect for the British officer than I have. I will remind your Lordships of what the British Army is in time of danger. At the outbreak of the Ashantee War a young officer volunteered for the service. Immediately afterwards one of the most eminent surgeons in this town, hearing of the fact, wrote to him, saying, "You know that I know you well. If you go to the West Coast of Africa it is simply death." Well, my gallant young friend put that letter in his pocket, did not tell one of his friends or relations about it, but wrote back to the surgeon that it was too late to change his plans. He went out—but did not return. That young man was the heir to a high fortune and to a seat in this House; but the minute he heard that fighting was going on he determined to go out. I do not mention this because he was a friend of mine or of any of your Lordships, but as a type of what the British officer feels when fighting is going on. But it is not only the British officer, but the British non-commissioned officer also: and, as for the British soldier, we sometimes hear complaints of the difficulty of recruiting. But the illustrious Duke will tell your Lordships that once there is war recruits come in abundantly. Therefore, I will not say a word against the British Army once there is a question of fighting. But when the question is one of irksome duty I will not say that the same readiness is found; and I am sure it is a mistake for Her Majesty's Government and the Legislature of this country to invent artificial modes of stimulating the desire of retiring from the Army. I have not a hope of the possible rejection of this Bill; but I should be wanting in my duty to my noble Friend behind me and to myself if I did not by my vote to-night utter a solemn protest against this most pernicious and unnecessary Bill which has been presented to your Lordships this evening.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: My Lords, as it seems to me, the debate this changes are an absolute necessity. The illustrious Duke on the cross-benches has used language which has been much quoted in reference to this subject. He said they were an inevitable evil—meaning not that he would wish under existing circumstances to prevent them, but that they are a necessary consequence of an Empire extending over so many climates as ours. We have to send men to Canada, China, and India. The men who have chests cannot go to Canada; the men who have livers cannot go to India. Most reasonable men will agree that if a man is not fit for the climate of India it is better to send him to a climate where he will be fit for service. Assuming, then, that exchanges are necessary, how are they to be obtained? Noble Lords opposite seem to assume that they will always come of themselves, and that there will always be an officer in England who wants to go to India for every officer in India who wants to come to England. This assumption is contradicted by the figures, which show that in the two years before the abolition of Purchase there were 159 exchanges, and only 97 in the two years following the abolition. The truth is that the difficulty of getting men to serve in India is still considerable. It is known to the illustrious Duke on the cross-benches that even now in the native Army of Madras there are as many as 30 vacancies among the local officers, while there are no candidates to fill them. Even with the high pay of India as compared with that of England there is no great pressure for exchanges. If you intend to keep up exchanges you must allow a free course of monetary considerations to act upon those who desire exchange. You must remember there are expenses which the War Office can never estimate. The noble Viscount was very confident that there was some accomplished person within the walls of the War Office who would be competent to say what amount of underclothing ladies would require. Well, the noble Viscount, I dare say, is well acquainted with and could lay his hand upon that competent man, but evidently my right hon. Friend is not yet acquainted with him. But there is one thing which this accomplished man would not be able to ascertain, and that is the amount which an officer would have to add to his insurance when he leaves this country. That is a legitimate expense.

The Marquess of Salisbury

On going to India he would have to pay a much higher premium. That money cannot be found by the State—it cannot be found by the outgoing officer—it can only be found by the officer who benefits by the exchange. In fact, it is impossible to estimate or control these expenses. The truth is that we have been sailing all along in very low latitudes. We have heard a great deal of the feelings of officers and very little of the interests of the public service. We have heard much of what the poorer officer would feel when he found he was unable to rise on account of his poverty; but I cannot admit that a feeling of that kind can legitimately be entertained on a question of this kind. If exchanges and the encouragement of exchanges are good to the public service, I do not care whether the system helps the rich man to Pall Mall and condemns the poor man to India. I do not care what theories in policy it violates; I do not care what sensitiveness or jealousy it may cause. If it is good for the public service that it should be so, all these considerations must be disregarded. My noble Friend the noble Marquess who represented the War Office in the last Administration (the Marquess of Lansdowne) told us what a fearful thing it would be if some Mephistopheles in the shape of an agent should tempt a young man to abandon the very glorious career that was opening before him in India. All my sympathies are with that young man. I think it is for the good of the public service that that young man should be tempted from a career for which he is obviously unfit, and relegated to the atmosphere of Pall Mall. Speaking as an Englishman, and in the interests of the public service, I should not much regret it. I will venture before I conclude to notice one mistake into which the noble Earl opposite fell in the course of his remarks. He told us about an Intelligent Foreigner, and that the Intelligent Foreigner was on his side, because exchanges were permitted in the French Army, and the French Army was not successful in the late war. I am speaking on very high authority when I say that exchange is permitted in the Prussian Army; and if that is the case, I am afraid the noble Lord made a mistake in the inference he drew, for whatever effect exchanges have had in the French Army, they have obviously had a good effect in the Prussian Army. The hour is too late to permit me to continue this argument; but I will only venture, in conclusion, to urge upon you that, trivial as this measure may in some of its aspects seem to be, it is a matter of much importance, worthy of your serious attention and of your decisive verdict. The earnestness with which the measure has been debated shows that it is not its mere apparent value you are requested to estimate. If you pass it you will pronounce a condemnation which is much needed upon the application of theoretic and pedantic formulas to the practical interests of the British Army. Philosophers produce splendid chimeras in their closets, and if those philosophers had power in the Legislature they would try to apply their chimerical views to the practical interests and wants of the State. It is for your Lordships, judging of these matters with impartial mind, to check a tendency which threatens much evil to the public weal. And you have another duty to perform. This Bill has been recommended to you by high authority. That it has been supported by large majorities in the other House, and by the unanimous voice of the Commission, will commend it to your prudence, and you will not be sorry to be able to grant a boon to a portion of an Army which, in recent arrangements, has been somewhat neglected—perhaps I may say has been hardly dealt with. It will be no small recommendation to you that this boon will be accepted by the Army with gratitude. But you must remember that it has been opposed by arguments, assertions, and vituperations of which it is not too much to say that they are base calumnies on the Army of which they were spoken. It is for you now, not by a narrow, but by a great majority, to place your stamp of condemnation upon those false assertions, and in giving a well-deserved boon to an Army which has so long adorned its country's annals to declare that in your estimate its reputation is as high, and its honour as untarnished as it has been through many centuries of fame.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided; Contents 137; Not-Contents 60: Majority 77.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MINUTES.]—WAYS AND MEANS—considered in Committee—LICENCES AND DUTIES.
PUBLIC BILL—Committee—Report—Public Health * [55-157].

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE WORTHING
MAGISTRATES.—QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in the newspapers, that a child of seven years old had been sentenced by the Worthing magistrates to three months' imprisonment for stealing some sugar plums and fourpence in money; and, if he will cause inquiry to be made in regard to the case?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the case in question, and from the result of his inquiries it appeared that the facts were rather peculiar and he should wish to offer an explanation. It seemed that the father of the boy resided in High Street, Worthing, in a corner shop, but he carried on no business. He was an habitual drunkard, and since the death of his wife, four or five years ago, his five children had been grossly neglected. In January, 1874, he was convicted and sentenced to 21 days' hard labour for neglecting to maintain them. On the hearing of the charge now in question he did not appear, but his housekeeper did, and instead of protecting the little boy she tried to make him out as bad as she could. On the same day a younger child of the man died, and at an inquest held upon it on Friday last, it appeared that though it had not been starved to death, yet death was accelerated by want of food. The Coroner severely censured the father. There was no mode of removing the child from the evil influences of home other than that adopted, for the boy, being under 10 years of age, could not be sent to a reformatory school. The report of the magistrates was that what had been done by them in sentencing the boy was an act of kindness to remove him from the evil influences which had surrounded him. His gaoler wrote that he concluded that the sentence upon the boy was intended as an act of kindness; and that he had requested the attention of the schoolmaster and the chaplain to his case. He added that he did not think that it would have been any use sentencing such a boy to a reformatory school, as there was none such that would receive him for some time to come. He also said that the boy should receive all proper kindness, and every effort should be used to reclaim him.

COAL MINES—COLLIERY EXPLOSION AT BUNKER'S HILL.—QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will instruct counsel to attend the coroner's inquest about to be held to ascertain the cause of death of the forty-two persons who lost their lives in the Bunker's Hill Colliery, North Stafford, on the 30th ultimo; whether he is aware that up till a recent period the coal was all worked without the use of blasting powder, and if it was only so got by the miners or colliers; and, whether he will state if a change in the mode of working has been made, it is done with the consent and full concurrence of the District Inspector?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, he had already stated that the fullest inquiry should be made as to the causes of this lamentable catastrophe. He had nothing to add to that, except that precisely the same course would be taken in this case as was adopted in the case of the Dukinfield explosion, and other similar cases, and which had proved entirely satisfactory to everybody concerned. With regard to the two latter parts of the Question, he had caused inquiries to be made, but had not yet received the answers.

THE PREROGATIVE OF PARDON. QUESTION.

MR. HANBURY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is intended to take any steps to assimilate in the various Colonies the procedure in reference to the exercise of the prerogative of pardon?

MR. J. LOWTHER: Sir, respecting the exercise of the prerogative of pardon, further Papers will shortly be presented to Parliament, by means of which the views of Her Majesty's Government upon this subject will be fully explained.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS — WHITSUNTIDE HOLIDAYS.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BARTTELOT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is able to state to the House the course of Business during next week; and also whether he will state on what day the Whitsuntide holidays will commence, and how long they will be allowed to remain away?

MR. DISRAELI, in reply, said, he should probably be able to announce on Monday the course of Business for the week. He proposed that the House should rise for the Whitsuntide holidays on Thursday, the 13th instant, and meet again on Thursday, the 20th.

WAYS AND MEANS—FINANCIAL STATEMENT.—COMMITTEE.

WAYS AND MEANS considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

1. Brewers Licences.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That in lieu of the Duties payable on Licences to Brewers of Beer for Sale (other than Brewers of Spruce or Black Beer) there shall be charged, collected, and paid on such Licences to be taken out on and after the first day of October, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-five, the following Duties (that is to say):

For and upon every Licence to be taken out yearly by any Brewer of Beer for Sale,—

If the quantity of Beer brewed within the year ending the thirtieth day of September next preceding shall not exceed fifty barrels, the Duty of 0 12 6

If the same shall exceed fifty barrels, then for every fifty barrels and for any fractional part or number of an entire quantity of fifty barrels, the Duty of 0 12 6

And for and upon every Licence to be taken out by any person who shall first become a Brewer of Beer for Sale, the Duty of 0 12 6

And there shall also be charged upon and paid by the last mentioned person in respect of his Licence, such further sum as with the said Duty of Twelve Shillings and Sixpence shall amount to the Duty which would be chargeable on a Licence for a quantity of Beer equal to the quantity brewed by him during the existence of his Licence, and such further sum shall be paid within ten days next after the expiration of the Licence."—(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I believe that I am correct in supposing that I shall be perfectly in Order in offering, on the present occasion, such general observations upon the Financial Statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the year as may appear to me to be required, although the immediate question before the Committee only refers to the proposal with regard to Brewers' Licences, and I shall accordingly proceed to make these observations. Sir, I was very glad last year, when my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer approached the consideration of his annual arrangements under circumstances of great disadvantage, to allow that, from his point of view, there was very little to complain of in his Budget. The plan of finance which we had meditated and proposed to the country had been rejected by a majority of the constituencies, and a different plan of finance with a different scale of expenditure were adopted by the incoming Government. It has been frequently stated—and it was even supposed by some—that the Estimates of the present Government last year were the Estimates that had received the sanction of the preceding Government, but that is an entire mistake. They were Estimates, no doubt, which were in preparation in the Departments for the judgment of the preceding Government, but they were not Estimates which had received the sanction of that Government, for no decision had been taken upon their proposed amount when Parliament was dissolved. However, I very much wish that I could have repeated or that I could have indulged in the use of similar language on the present occasion, or, better still, have refrained from troubling the House with any observations of mine as to the finances of the year. I must own I was under the expectation when my right hon. Friend was about to make his Statement, that he must necessarily present a Budget of extremely small dimensions and of exceedingly small interest, because when it was found that his expenditure was large and that his means were narrow, there was very little that could possibly be expected from him, and under those circumstances the House could hardly claim credit for over-indulgence in submitting to the necessity of the case, and allowing the Chancellor of the Exchequer to travel quietly forward without attempting plans which would afford relief or challenge criticism. But I am bound to say that there are a number of points in the Budget, small as is its scale, which call for remark—in some cases, for approval; in some, for inquiry; and in others for criticism or disapproval. I wish, in the first place, to say a word on the subject of the income tax. It is one of such great importance that it is exceedingly desirable the House of Commons and the country should understand with precision the ground taken by the Executive Government in regard to this most important impost. Now the impression has gone abroad that my right hon. Friend intended to convey in his speech that the Government had considered the matter, and did not now propose a merely annual renewal of the tax at 2*d.* in the pound, but that it was a matter which ought to culminate in that form, not necessarily permanently, but only as an impost of which that ought to be considered the normal condition in time of peace. Well, it is desirable that that should be understood, because that was certainly not the impression that would have been formed by any Gentleman who conceived that the present Government drew its inspiration in this matter from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire, because at the time when he issued his address to the electors of Buckinghamshire, and when the then responsible Advisers of the Crown had pledged their responsibility for the removal of the income tax, the right hon. Gentleman gave it to be understood that not less was to be expected from him in that respect than from the then Government, for, says he—

“The principal measures of relief will be the diminution of local taxation and the abolition of the income tax, measures which the Conservatives have always favoured and which the Prime Minister has always opposed.”

I must admit that was a piece of history, like many pieces of history which have proceeded from the same quarter, which was entirely new to me and had not been embraced in my narrow studies. But apart from history I look to opinion, and I should like to know whether it is the opinion of the Government—for which my right hon. Friend on that assumption has already received great credit from the one really great financial authority—The Economist—and there is nothing invidious towards other journals in speaking of that as the leading organ in financial matters—he has, I say, received great credit for having thrown over the false and erroneous doctrine held by former

stitute. It is, I know, the opinion of some of the most eminent French military authorities that the system of exchanges in the French Army had in the last war a very bad effect; it destroyed to a very great degree the esprit de corps of the French regiments. My Lords, we do not object to exchanges. We have sanctioned exchanges in various departments of the Public Service. The only question is, whether in the Army alone the passing of money should be legalized between officers in order to promote exchanges. I have at different periods held various offices in the State, as Secretary for the Colonies, Foreign Minister, and President of the Council. I have often been applied to to sanction exchanges, and my answer has always been—"You have been a good officer; when there is a vacancy I will take care to put the new man in your place and you in a more southern district." But, what would have been my feelings if I had learnt that £500 had been pocketed by either of the parties on the occasion of the exchange? The noble and learned Lord (Lord Penzance) stated that these persons had established a grievance, and the only alternative the Commission had was either to ignore the grievances of the officers or to make the recommendation they did. I do not think that was the only alternative. If it were a pecuniary grievance it would have been easy to recommend a money compensation, or another thing which might be perhaps more difficult—that this compensation should be continued to the officers who had entered the Service before Purchase was abolished. The noble and learned Lord repelled with some indignation the idea that the Commissioners recommended a course which would be pernicious to the British Army; and in the only part of his speech in which there was any warmth referred to the word "huckstering" as applied to officers who might take advantage of this system. He said that a thing which had not happened for 100 years was not likely to occur in the future. But my noble Friend the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne) read just now a sentence from a noble Lord of high authority on the subject, saying how impossible it was for the military authorities to check abuses under the circumstances referred to. But in the very sentence before I find such words as these—

"A mercenary spirit is created in men whose guiding principle should be a nice sense of honour and a loyal attachment to the Service."

These are words which I do not wish to adopt; but coming from such high authority, they do not justify the noble and learned Lord in what he has said. Now, with regard to the noble profession of arms, I venture to say that there is no one who has more respect for the British officer than I have. I will remind your Lordships of what the British Army is in time of danger. At the outbreak of the Ashantee War a young officer volunteered for the service. Immediately afterwards one of the most eminent surgeons in this town, hearing of the fact, wrote to him, saying, "You know that I know you well. If you go to the West Coast of Africa it is simply death." Well, my gallant young friend put that letter in his pocket, did not tell one of his friends or relations about it, but wrote back to the surgeon that it was too late to change his plans. He went out—but did not return. That young man was the heir to a high fortune and to a seat in this House; but the minute he heard that fighting was going on he determined to go out. I do not mention this because he was a friend of mine or of any of your Lordships, but as a type of what the British officer feels when fighting is going on. But it is not only the British officer, but the British non-commissioned officer also: and, as for the British soldier, we sometimes hear complaints of the difficulty of recruiting. But the illustrious Duke will tell your Lordships that once there is war recruits come in abundantly. Therefore, I will not say a word against the British Army once there is a question of fighting. But when the question is one of irksome duty I will not say that the same readiness is found; and I am sure it is a mistake for Her Majesty's Government and the Legislature of this country to invent artificial modes of stimulating the desire of retiring from the Army. I have not a hope of the possible rejection of this Bill; but I should be wanting in my duty to my noble Friend behind me and to myself if I did not by my vote to-night utter a solemn protest against this most pernicious and unnecessary Bill which has been presented to your Lordships this evening.

is a proposal in which I hope the Government will not persevere. Having watched the Post Office Savings Bank with considerable interest from its infancy, I shall be bound to oppose the proposition if it is submitted to the Committee. But there is another proposal contained in the Bill which, I think, is an excellent one, and it is that instead of going on with this real charge upon the country—a liability of the country concealed from our eyes which is kept in a separate account of which Parliament hears nothing, except when special occasions arise—the deficiency—for deficiency it must be for some time—shall be made a regular charge, and shall be made a regular charge to be disclosed to the House of Commons each year, and to be provided for as part of the financial measure of that year. I also understand that it is the intention of the Government that in future years there shall be submitted to the House of Commons what is called in the Financial Statement “Local Budgets,” and that likewise appears to me to be in itself a very wise and useful proceeding. I have no objection to make to such an arrangement, and I know of but one difficulty in the way of carrying it out—namely, that it will entail a very serious addition to the labours of an already overburdened Parliament. I confess, however, that, although I think that Parliament is overburdened, such is not the general opinion, because we see deputation after deputation, headed by Members of Parliament, waiting upon various Departments of the Government, imploring the latter to assume functions other than they now exercise, and we see that those deputations meet with the most courteous and flattering receptions, and with such replies as encourage them to repeat their visits and multiply their proposals. But be that as it may, I think that in view of the enormous extension of the system of local loans, the proposal of the Government on this point may be a sound one in principle and one to which I do not object. That is all that I need say at present upon the financial and administrative propositions contained in the Financial Statement of the year; but I come now to consider that which I regard as a more important matter—namely, the mode of stating the accounts of the country, and of presenting to the House of Commons the balance of the income and the charges of the country. This is a subject that appears to have attracted no attention at all from critics out-of-doors; for, as far as I am able to judge, there has scarcely been a word of discussion on this point during the present year, and I should say, speaking impartially, that the reception of the Budget by the Press is uniformly favourable, and it is therefore possible that I may be in a very small minority in my old-fashioned views and notions with regard to the form in which the accounts of the nation should be stated. Such as my views on the question are, however, I hope that the House of Commons will permit me to state them, because it rests with this House to determine what those forms shall be, and upon it rests the responsibility of resisting dangerous innovations which to my mind do not deserve its sanction. There can be no doubt as to the elementary rules that ought to govern the conduct of the Financial Minister with regard to this subject. They are three in number. Let it be remembered at starting that I am not condemning the action of the Treasury as being wanting in judicious economy, because I frankly admit that such economy prevails there, and that to those who control the Treasury every credit should be given. The first duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is to reduce the expenditure of the country; the second is to keep the income of the country above the charges; and the third is to present nothing to the country and to the House of Commons, except figures that will bear careful and searching examination; for we must not forget that the House of Commons deals with the Government in matters of finance upon terms of great disadvantage. On most questions that are discussed in this House numbers of hon. Members are able to follow the subject and to give opinions of weight with regard to it, but on questions of finance that is not the case. Our system of finance is often complained of as being so complicated, and people ask why we do not have a more simple system of finance; but I believe that the primary condition of our financial system should be not so much to secure simplicity in our accounts, as a system that is certain, safe, and well calculated to maintain the control of Parliament. And I venture to say, after a long experience, that, however desirable simplicity may be, I doubt the possibility of combining the attainment of the greater ends to which I have referred with the simplicity in our accounts which some persons desire. It is, therefore, of the utmost consequence that every figure given by the Government should be such as to bear a searching examination, and that the course hitherto adopted for giving solidity to our finances is rigorously and strictly maintained. But the necessary result of this complication in our present financial system is, that there only exists a small number of persons in this House who can follow the financial accounts of the country. I do not mean as to the expediency of laying on or of taking off particular taxes, but as to the mode of bringing to a proper account those enormous sums which pass through the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is possibly the greatest banker in the world, and has, in that character, to deal with affairs which are scattered all over the face of the earth. Under these circumstances, I think that the rules of finance that are the result of the experience of former times should be rigorously and strictly maintained, and the question is, have those rules been followed by the Government in the present instance? I will state in terms, I hope, not of exaggeration, what appears to me to be the state of the case, and I shall be all the better pleased if the Government are able to answer my objections to their accounts satisfactorily. I am not about to hold my right hon. Friend responsible for the recent growth of the national expenditure; I am sorry to say that the growth of the expenditure seems to be one of the normal incidents of the accession to power of the Party to which he belongs. ["No, no!"] I should like to see some proof to the contrary. What I have always required and desired—what was once the established rule of the country, but which has been entirely forgotten for the last 20 years of my Parliamentary life—was a generous rivalry between the two great political Parties of the State on matters of economy; but that is no longer so, and the figures and accounts of the last 20 years will determine the question more satisfactorily than any arguments or ingenuity of mine can do. I wish, however, to keep to facts, and not to enter on arguments, having no desire to give a political character to what ought to be strictly a matter of business. On looking at the Supply Services for 1874-5 and comparing them with those of 1873-4, after deducting the two great items of the Alabama accounts and the Ashantee War charges, there appears to be, according to my calculation, an increase under the head of public expenditure of £1,360,000, which appears to be a pretty good sample for a first year's performance. But I am bound to say, at the same time, that the Government by increasing the expenditure of the country are acting in a manner not generally disapproved, although I disapprove their action in the matter. My ideas on the subject, as I said before, may be antiquated and belong to a period of some 20, 30, or 40 years ago; but the Government may some day awaken to the fact which they do not seem to understand now—that these continual additions in detail to the expenditure of the country do act upon the totals. Many people think that a gross paradox; but it is, on the contrary, one of the most common-place matters of fact that these totals do determine the sound state of our finances, and put it out of the power of the British Parliament to diminish the burdens of the people by reducing the taxation. I am right in saying that the Estimates of the present year show a considerable increase over those of the previous year, notwithstanding the strenuous efforts of the Treasury to keep down the total of the expenditure. That, however, is not the fault of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in common Christian charity I ought to say that the responsibility for that increase rests upon the Government, and that responsibility is shared by Parliament, which must be prepared to let the country understand that it requires and sanctions a constantly growing national expenditure. But although it may not be the fault of my right hon. Friend that the expenditure of the country is growing, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer makes proposals to the country which do not present a clear surplus of income over expenditure in estimating the circumstances of the country for the coming year, he is guilty of a default of duty which, besides affecting the Government generally, affects himself specially. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is also specially responsible for all that relates to the accounts of the country. These are the points upon which I wish now to make some reference—that is, to the figures in the Financial Statement. Firstly, with regard to the manner in which the account of Revenue and charge was made out. The House will have observed that last year there was a surplus on the Revenue, as compared with the Expenditure, of £594,000; but they will also have observed that the account which has been presented to Parliament this year since the Financial Statement, shows not a surplus of £594,000, but a deficiency of £6,000. This is a matter I think it right to touch upon, without at the same time, dwelling upon it as one of capital importance. I do not think that there has been any uniformity of practice with regard to the mode of stating the accounts. Sometimes the whole of the Expenditure, including loans—and it is the question of loans which makes the difference—has been given in the Financial Statement of the year; and I think it is better that it should be so. For the most part, when there is a large surplus, it is almost immaterial whether it is stated or not, and fortunately, on many occasions of late years, there have been large surpluses to announce to the House. When, however, it so happens that that loan expenditure makes the difference between a respectable surplus and a small deficiency, I think it is most desirable that it should be distinctly stated, and it seems to me it would have been better to have included it in the Financial Statement of the present year. Whether we are wise in including the known loan expenditure in that expenditure which is ascertained before the balance is struck to determine the surplus applicable for the reduction of debt is another matter upon which I might have something to say, and upon which I can easily conceive that argument might be made. My object in referring to this subject is not to cast blame, for I think it is a small matter whether the thing was stated or not. My wish is to point out the usefulness of the rule which has on this occasion been neglected. It is useful and important to bring before Parliament on the only regular occasion when the attention of Parliament is effectually given to the finance of the country, the whole expenditure of the country. It does not signify whether it is from Revenue or from loan, the House of Commons ought at one conspicuous period of the year to understand fully what is the entire expenditure which has been made under its sanction, or under the sanction of the Executive Government. It is an old and valuable practice of finance, and if the thing be not done at the period of the Financial Statement, it may as well not be done at all. No notice is taken of these things if they are severed from that one great central occasion, and I should be very glad if, without censuring anyone, my drawing attention to the matter should have the effect of causing this useful practice to be observed in future years. But, Sir, there is another operation connected with the Revenue of last year which I confess appears to me to be much more difficult to defend. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said to us, in the fairest and most ingenuous manner, in the course of his Financial Statement, that the apparent deficiency in the Miscellaneous Revenue of the country was owing to a special cause. The words ascribed to him in the report are these—

“It was owing to my having given instructions that there should be no haste in calling in certain receipts which might have been paid in before the 31st of March, but which it did not appear necessary to call in, and which it would be better to leave for this year.”—[3 Hansard, ccxxiii. 1026.]

Here, Sir, I must frankly state that I think my right hon. Friend, in assuming to himself the liberty of checking the inflow of any portion of the Revenue in order to enlarge the resources of the coming year, committed a serious error—an error so serious that, though all I desire on the present occasion is to make it understood, I should, in default of anyone else, feel it my duty, if it were defended, to challenge the judgment of the House in regard to it in case it should become a practice. I am not aware of such a thing having been done before. This, however, I do remember, that during the existence of the late Government, a very vigilant Member of Parliament who did us some good service in matters of finance—namely, Mr. White, then Member for Brighton—inquired of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) then Chancellor of the Exchequer, what was the cause of the great and evidently exceptional augmentation of receipts in the first week of the financial year, and whether it was owing to the keeping back of the Indian receipts at the suggestion of the Treasury, and my right hon. Friend is reported to have replied as follows:—

“There was no doubt that the excess for that week was due to the causes assigned in the Question; but it was equally certain that that result had not been obtained in consequence of any suggestion from the Treasury.”—[3 Hansard, ccx. 1263.]

Now, if I understand the Chancellor of the Exchequer rightly on the present occasion it was by a suggestion from the Treasury that a sum of £300,000—which I may observe would have been a real and legal surplus, though a small one, in last year's transactions—was kept back and taken out of the account of last year, and brought into the account of this year, because “it would be better to leave it for this year.” This, I believe, is not acting in accordance with the spirit of those regulations which govern the collection of our Revenue and the methods of bringing out the accounts. Under the Orders of the Treasury, the receivers general of Revenue are bound to pay it in daily to the Exchequer. No delay whatever is permitted in respect to any branch of the Revenue. It is perfectly true that, in a certain sense, there is no receiver general of Miscellaneous Revenue, but at the same time it is quite evident that the regulation of the Treasury requires daily payment from every Revenue Department: this rule merely expressing the principle that what becomes due to the public should at once be placed to the credit of the public and not be delayed in its passage to suit the convenience of any Government, be that Government what it may. Obviously this principle is one of the greatest consequence, for there are no bounds to the extent to which a contrary practice might be carried. It is a Treasury Order, and a Treasury Order alone, and not the law of the land, that secures the proper payment of the Revenue. These delay payments are made by the Revenue Departments under the Order of the Treasury. Were the Treasury to send Orders to the Revenue Departments to suspend them for the week, any Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had to meet a large expenditure, and did not like the responsibility of imposing new taxes, might, by stopping the inflow of Revenue of the last week of the year, throw into the coming year such a surplus as entirely to dispense with the necessity of increased taxation. That will show the House that the question here at issue is really one of principle and a measure of the deepest possible importance. No doubt the designs of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were most innocent, as we may clearly see from the ingenuousness with which he stated them to the House. He gave us an opportunity, manfully and honourably, of raising the question. For my part I must say that I believe the practice to be unprecedented and decidedly dangerous, and I earnestly hope that it will not be repeated. So much, Sir, for the account of the last year and the mode of handling the Revenue for that year. I now come to the Estimate for the present year, and to a rather minute examination of what is supposed to be the surplus upon the figures of the Financial Statement. That surplus is stated at £417,000. My doctrine is, that there is no surplus at all, and not only so, but that there is a considerable amount of probable charge quite unprovided for, independently of any scheme for the reduction of the Debt. Let us see how it stands. We start with £417,000 the reality of which I do not dispute; but I find the Chancellor of the Exchequer is reported to have said in reply to my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. Childers), who found fault with the surplus as being overcharged with weight of expenditure, that his Estimates were taken at a very reasonable and moderate figure. Now I must make a comment on the practice of taking Estimates at a very reasonable and moderate figure, and I affirm with the utmost confidence that no Chancellor of the Exchequer has the smallest right at the commencement of the financial year to take credit for the probable incoming of any Revenue beyond that which he has anticipated in his Estimates. It is his duty to include in his Estimates whatever Revenue seems to him probable—neither more nor less—and that is a duty to the performance of which the House of Commons ought tightly and stringently to bind him. In that way they would maintain what their Predecessors valued so much—namely, the financial control of Parliament over the expenditure of the country. I must take the Estimates as they are presented. If we show that the figures will not bear the expenditure of which we already know, and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Government are disposing of money they do not possess, it is not a sufficient answer to say that the Estimates are taken moderately. There is one course open, and it is this—the Chancellor of the Exchequer should reconsider the Estimates and make such additions to them as, in his judgment, may be necessary and justifiable. But you cannot have it both ways, and say, in presenting Estimates at a given figure —“I have other sums in reserve which you know nothing about, but on which I can rely, and as to which I ask you to charge some portion of the expenditure.” I shall, therefore, take the Estimates as real Estimates, and assume that they show a surplus of £417,000. The reduction of £60,000 in respect of Brewers' Licences brings that sum down to £357,000. We have lately adopted a principle which it is necessary to explain for a moment to the House with regard to the large business which we transact in loans and advances for public works and otherwise which enters into the statement of the Revenue and charge of the country. We have begun to take credit for the interest which we receive on those loans and advances; and if we take credit for the interest we receive on them, it is quite plain that when we borrow money in order to make them, we must charge ourselves with the interest which we have to pay on that money. I am not certain whether I am quite correct in what I am going to say; but as I understand that the Chancellor of the Exchequer—if I am wrong he will correct me—has this year borrowed money for the purpose of making these loans, and that he expects to have to pay £70,000 as interest on it. That is part of the actual charge for the year, and it must be taken as against the surplus of £417,000, because when the interest on the loans so made comes in, it goes to the credit of Revenue, in which case it must go to the debit of Revenue when the loans are contracted. Therefore, we must reduce £357,000 to £297,000. But then, Sir, it is part of the plans of the Government, and I own a most excellent part, that they should charge upon the finance of the country from year to year the deficiency into which we have allowed the Friendly Societies and Savings Banks

Funds to fall. If you like to take credit in the surplus for the Post Office funds you may do so; but I find that the aggregate deficiency, as shown by the Bill submitted to the House by the Government, is at present £3,700,000 in round numbers, and the interest on that deficiency is £120,000 a-year, which has not been mentioned in the Financial Statement, but which must evidently be part of the charge of the year. That £120,000, taken from £297,000 brings it down to £177,000. Then there is a charge for which, as a public charge, I am sorry my right hon. Friend made no provision in the Estimate of Income and Expenditure which he presented to the House, and that is a charge on account of Irish Education. The amount of the charge last year was £118,000. It has not yet been stated to Parliament in an Estimate. Why? Was it withheld in order to be reduced? No, Sir, it is withheld in order to be augmented. Therefore, using the best information at my command, the £177,000 to which I have already referred has to be still further reduced by £118,000, which leaves you £59,000 as all that remains of your surplus of £417,000, and that surplus of £59,000 must be charged with the augmentation, whatever it may be, in the Irish Education Vote, which has been actually announced. I do not know what it will be; it may be £30,000, or it may be £40,000, or more. There was also mentioned in the discussion that it was the intention of the Government to make a proposal for paying a portion of the expenses of the Registration Act. Has that been provided for in the Estimates? [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Yes, it has.] Then nothing need be said further respecting that. Well, we have got the surplus reduced to £59,000, against which, as I have said, there is the increase on the Irish Education Vote, and the result, I say, is that there is no surplus at all; for in a question of this kind, you cannot dispute about a mere £10,000 or £20,000. Now, Sir, I submit that the charges which I have stated to the House are positive charges, every one of which ought to be provided for in the plans of the Government; and the effect of them is that they eat the whole of the surplus—substantially, the whole of the surplus which has been announced to us by the “ “ “ the Exchequer;

and yet that surplus had a great deal else to do, for, first of all, is there to be a surplus of Revenue or not? Now, it is the established principle of finance that the whole of the charge for the year, so far as it can be foreseen, is to be submitted to the country, as a charge, when the Financial Statement is made; and if any of the elements of that charge are uncertain, they are not to be kept out of view. The established rule is that the Chancellor of the Exchequer has to state them as well as he can, and take a sum which he thinks ample to cover them, charging himself with the whole of the sum before he presents anything that he is justified, in the face of Parliament, in calling a surplus. Of course, I do not speak of a time when a great war is impending, when £5,000,000 or £10,000,000 might have to be added to the expenditure of the year: it is impossible to say what the charges may be then; but I speak of the regular state of things in time of peace, which may be roughly called the normal state of things; and I say it is the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in such cases to present to Parliament, before taking credit for any surplus at all, what he thinks will be the probable amount of those charges. I wish very much to know whether that principle is challenged, because I hold it to be essential to sound finance, and even, in the long run, to what would be called by Parliament, honest finance. My right hon. Friend has said there will be Supplementary Estimates, but that he does not know what they will be; and because he does not know what they will be, he does not provide a farthing to meet them. I say it is his absolute duty to make the best computation he can of those Supplementary Estimates, and to charge himself with the whole of them before he so much as pronounces the word "surplus" to the House. And so, Sir, the £417,000 presented to us as a surplus has vanished from our view; it is nowhere; it has gone to supply purposes valuable and important, no doubt, but still it is gone; and what remains? It has three or four duties which it ought to do. It ought to perform the function of meeting Supplementary Estimates, as well as the right hon. Gentleman can calculate them. After that it ought still to leave Parliament in a position to say—"We have provided for unseen contingencies a surplus of income over charge for the coming year;" instead of that, however, it has to bear all the charges I have stated, and besides it has to supply the sum of £185,000 which is to be voted for the reduction of the National Debt, and of which the Government does not possess a single shilling. I do not refer to the details of the Supplementary Estimates. An hon. Friend of mine put a Question the other day as to the charge for the proposed Royal Progress through India, and the Question was answered by the right hon. Gentleman opposite with much tact and skill. I say nothing of that charge, because I know nothing; but I hold that it is in the power of the Treasury, by communication with the Departments, to know what the Supplementary Estimates are likely to be, and that their probable amount is part of the information that ought to be submitted to us before we proceed to strike a balance between the Revenue and Expenditure of the year. I now propose to make some remarks on the plans of my right hon. Friend in respect to the National Debt, in the light of the observations I have already offered in regard to the condition of his most shadowy and ghostly surplus, which it appears is fully and more than fully charged—nay, charged three or four times over—for different public purposes, a course of proceeding which I contend it is impossible for him or any other person to carry out in practice. My right hon. Friend has proposed a scheme with regard to the National Debt which has received the marked approbation of what are believed to be the most sagacious of all things inanimate—namely, the Three per Cents. He is very much pleased—and I do not wonder at it—because half a per cent, forsooth, has been added to that part of the National Debt in consequence of the promulgation of the scheme of the Government for its reduction; but there are sceptical persons who may say this fact proves that the Three per Cents are not of that high order of intellect which they have been considered to be. Let us look at this matter a little. There are three modes by which the National Debt may be reduced—one is by a surplus of Revenue over Expenditure; one is by Terminable Annuities; and the third is by fixed appropriations beforehand. I tell the Government fairly that, so far as I am concerned, my own deep conviction is that, although we have done a good deal, we have never done as much as we ought to have done in the reduction of the Debt. That has always been my opinion, and I am thankful to say my right hon. Friend near me (Mr. Lowe) was enabled during five years of his administration to surpass every preceding Chancellor of the Exchequer in this matter; but even the standard of reduction established by him did not, I think, at all answer the powers and capacities of a country so great as this, if they were accompanied by an equal forethought and a desire to guard against the probable contingencies of the future. Having those views, it may be said, and truly so, that I ought not to be fastidious as to my preference as between one mode and another of reducing the Debt. Well, I ought not, and I will take any mode that you show to be real; but my objection to this proposal is that it is totally unreal, totally opposed to authority and to the test of experience. You will see if I make good this objection. First, we may reduce the Debt by Terminable Annuities; and here the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave the House the figures, which I have no doubt are perfectly correct; and they are of the most instructive character. Down to a certain date, he showed us what had been done by two modes that have been adopted for the reduction of the Debt, and he likewise showed us what had been done by the contraction of new loans. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: They were up to the present time.] At any rate, however far they may extend, as far as the principle is concerned, the effect will be the same. The figures, which are extremely simple, are these. The surpluses of Revenue over Expenditure amounted, when put together, to £40,000,000. But these surpluses of Revenue over Expenditure are, unfortunately, outweighed by the surpluses of Expenditure over Revenue, because, although we may divide these surpluses of Expenditure into two classes, according as they are unforeseen deficiencies, or according as they are loans, yet a loan means nothing in the world but the expression of a deficiency in the year's income over the Expenditure. And while the whole of those surpluses amounted to £40,000,000, the deficiencies, together with the loans that it was found necessary to raise were £73,000,000 as the surpluses concerned, although effort made by Governments for the—great efforts—vigilant men—your balance of Revenue are concerned, as you must do, deficiency of £33,000,000. The whole of effected by means. They have of the Chancellor effected a reduction which balance £33,000,000, reduction of £87,000,000 to enter into a view, is the Terminable Annuity, a visionary scheme to reduce the Debt; that Terminable Annuity will reduce it; and for the reduction of the Debt show that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in showing that there is no surplus of Revenue over Expenditure, and that we are unable to meet our debts, in which the emptying of the Treasury of 30 years takes credit every year. proceeding last 30 or 40 years have borrowed more than we have done more surpluses in the last 30 years it is not a moment to permit to Parliament the assumption of 30 years of £15,000,000 is to say experience before will what circumstances my right hon. Friend has £500,000 have been of encouragement; but

Exchequer, who has not one farthing of surplus, who presents to you an imaginary surplus of £500,000 for 30 years to come, for every one of which years the surplus is founded upon the assumption that every future Chancellor of the Exchequer will do the exact opposite of what the present one is doing. This is a somewhat extraordinary result, and it is necessary that the House of Commons, in the first instance, the intelligent editors of critical periodicals in the second, and the Three per Cents in the third instance, should take some cognizance of these facts. A word or two now with regard to the third method of reducing the Debt, respecting which I will not enter into any comparison between Dr. Price, Mr. Pitt, Lord Grenville, and Lord Bexley. They had different methods of proceeding; but it is a waste of time to enter into a distinction between one of these plans and another. The essential point of these plans is this—that whereas a surplus of Revenue proceeds upon firm conviction that there shall be a surplus, the whole value of that plan depends upon exacting rigidly from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that from year to year he shall present to you not a nominal, but a real surplus. While that the Terminable Annuities have proved what they have actually done, that plan has for its essential feature this system of making a fixed appropriation of money by prior Act of Parliament. Of money did I say? No, Sir, not of money. If it were a fixed appropriation of money, there would be a great deal to say for it, and I would be slow to quarrel with it. But it is a fixed appropriation of figures and ciphers written down on a sheet of paper—of figures written down too on such a scale that they have revealed that glorious sum of £230,000,000 which has astounded the Three per Cents and bewildered their imagination. Why, it is not clear from the Estimates of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this year there will be even a surplus of the most slender description. What I submit to the Committee is this—that these methods of providing for the reduction of the Debt by annual appropriations, arbitrarily fixed by those who do not intend to find the money for them, but who think it laudable and creditable to lay it down that future Parliaments shall find that money, have been tried and tested by experience and have failed again and again. If they have been so tried and tested, and if they have so failed, I ask is it wise—and I give my right hon. Friend credit for the best motives, for he has, no doubt, had the idea that a plan of this kind would be an efficient check upon expenditure—again to resort to them? I know my right hon. Friend is the last man who would deliberately produce an exploded fiction; but I ask him to consider in the light of experience, and not in the bewildering light of hazy speculation, whether this plan of proceeding is not a fiction detected by experience? After the Great War, the statesmen of that day were profoundly impressed with the necessity of reducing the National Debt. They began by paying off a large sum which had been borrowed, and which constituted the large balances in the Treasury at the close of the War. They began with the very best intentions. Popular feelings with regard to the oppressive operation of existing taxes were not then so accurately represented in this House as they now are, so that the circumstances of Parliament were in many respects favourable to paying off the Debt. The plan adopted was this: In the year 1819 it was determined that £5,000,000 should be provided every year for paying off the Debt. No doubt, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has studied all these details, and yet, if he has, I think they ought to have impressed his mind more than the mind of other people. £5,000,000 were to be appropriated for paying off the Debt. Were they so appropriated? Not even in that Parliament, the majority of which held seats hardly accessible to the faintest breath of popular opinion—not even in that Parliament was that sum applied for the reduction of the Debt. The whole sum that was applied to the reduction of the Debt between the years 1816 and 1828 was considerably less under the operation of this £5,000,000 system, with certain modifications which I shall mention by-and-by, than the annual amount which was applied to it by my right hon. Friend near me when he was Chancellor of Exchequer. This law, with regard to the appropriation of £5,000,000 remained an absolutely dead letter. You may pass a law that you will pay off the whole National Debt this year, but it will remain an absolutely dead letter.

It will do nobody any good, and it will do nobody any harm, except those who are weak enough to believe it. So it was in this case, the law with regard to the £5,000,000 remained, but the money was not provided, and at last they began to think that this state of matters was unsatisfactory, and that a demand of £5,000,000 every year was too heavy. So they said—"Let us make it more moderate, and the amount of money will be provided." They reduced the demand to £3,000,000; but it was exactly the same thing over again. They passed a law that £3,000,000 should be provided, and the £3,000,000 were not provided. Then there sat a Committee of great weight on Finance in the year 1828. That Committee was, I may say, then accepted as almost conclusive authority on the subject and has been so from that day to this. That Committee distinctly reported against the whole system of fixed appropriations. They said—

"The Committee are of opinion that, instead of a fixed sinking fund, the surplus of Revenue only should be appropriated annually in the mode hereafter stated to the reduction of the Debt."

That is the principle upon which now for 47 years the successive Governments of this country have acted, and from which we are now requested to depart. So broke down the plan of fixed appropriations; but in the course of time there arose another Chancellor of the Exchequer, a man of great ability—a man immensely respected and, I may say, beloved in this House; a man whose character was eminently that of a circumspect and practical statesman—I mean the late Sir George Cornewall Lewis. That eminent man, when it became his duty to borrow for the purposes of the Crimean War, satisfied himself that it would be worth while to try this scheme. In 1855, he made a loan of £15,000,000 or £16,000,000; and he invited the House to insert in the Bill then before it, a clause to the effect that in every financial year—beginning with the first year after the signature of a definitive treaty of peace, £1,000,000 should be applied to the reduction of this Debt. That was the clause which he recommended to the House, and I am sorry to say it was one which he prevailed upon the House to accept. It was no wonder that it should have done so, for there was no one whose advice it was more disposed to follow, and no one who more deserved that that should be the case. But the clause excited sharp resistance. I, myself, was one of those who stoutly protested against it; and amongst those who made excellent speeches against it was the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Government. This, the House must bear in mind, was one of those measures for the reduction of Debt by means of fixed appropriations; and the right hon. Gentleman said—

"I trust the House will hesitate before it assents to this 22nd clause. What is it? It is neither more nor less than a recurrence to the system of creating an artificial sinking fund; and, to my mind, no principle can be more pernicious."—[3 Hansard, cxxxvii, 1967-8.]

The right hon. Gentleman, with the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, and several other right hon. Gentlemen. Members of the present Government, very loyally and properly went into the same Lobby, all harmoniously uniting on that occasion. I said I objected to the clause exceedingly. I said—"If my right hon. Friend is Chancellor of the Exchequer when the war is over, and if he endeavours to induce the House to provide a million of money and give a vote for it, I shall be found voting with him." I was in that patriotic state of mind that I would assist him to provide the million. Well, the war did come to an end, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer did come forward to make provision for the year. It was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire; but I had no opportunity of assisting the right hon. Gentleman in persuading Parliament to provide this money. The right hon. Gentleman said it was not to be expected that the money was to be provided. He had always been against the clause. A former Chancellor of the Exchequer had carried a majority of the House in voting the clause into the law, and the right hon. Gentleman carried the whole House with him in voting it out of the law, with only a faint and feeble protest from a single ghost of the old Liberal Treasury Bench that then sat on this side of the House. It appears to me that these are historical matters which really amount to a sufficient teaching of experience upon the whole subject that is before us. My right hon. Friend said to it. I pass from these matters in order to reply to that part of the speech of my right hon. Friend which is in the nature of a direct personal attack on myself—I mean officially personal, because no one can be more sensible than I am of the extreme kindness and courtesy with which the right hon. Gentleman treats me individually in discussing these matters, and I shall not be misunderstood when I say he has made severe comments upon the framework and principle of the Budget, which I had the honour to submit a week or two ago. It is really essential I should deal frankly and freely with those criticisms, and satisfy the House that there is no foundation whatever for any imputation cast upon me or the present Government of departing from the old frank, honest, and straightforward system of finance. On the contrary, we are prepared to challenge comparison with any of our Predecessors in this respect on any point of practice. I come then to the three points which my right hon. Friend says the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought to bear in mind in dealing with the finances of the year—namely, to keep down, or, as he said, to reduce the expenditure; to maintain the income above the charge; and to present figures to Parliament which will bear thorough examination. With regard to the question of keeping down the expenditure, I can only say that I thank him most sincerely for supporting me in my position as Chancellor of the Exchequer by keeping a vigilant eye, and making severe comments upon the natural tendencies not of the Government, but of Parliament and the country, continually to raise the expenditure. I am no advocate of unthinking and indiscriminate economy; I am not prepared to say the public service ought to be stinted or impaired, or that the natural desires of the country ought to be thwarted when the expenditure called for is reasonably within the country's means and likely to be beneficial and useful. At the same time I am painfully conscious, from daily experience in my position as Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the demands made upon me from all quarters induce me to welcome support, from whatever quarter it may come, to my anxious desire to check and resist any undue increase of expenditure. But in speaking of the increase this year and last my right hon. Friend must have included the sums which have been paid in subvention of local finance. Now I am not sure that a subvention to local finance can be regarded simply in the light of increased expenditure. What you give in subvention of local expenditure is a relief to rates. It is a reduction of one form of taxation at the expense of the Exchequer, but it is still a relief to the nation. Although I am not one of those who think that the Exchequer should give with both hands in subvention of local government, still money given in aid of the rates cannot be regarded as money thrown away in the same way as if it had been expended on the ordinary Supply Services of the year. Passing over that matter, I must next notice the remark of my right hon. Friend—that it is the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to keep the income of the year above the charges, and here my right hon. Friend began by saying he was going to call our attention to those old-fashioned principles which he admires, and he challenged me for not having taken into account—when I presented my balance of Revenue and Expenditure the other day—the item for fortifications and local defences. He says that I presented a Budget putting the surplus of income over expenditure at £417,000; but that if I had deducted the sum expended on account of fortifications and barracks, I should have found myself with a deficiency of £6,000. I quite admit that if you state the account in that way there is a deficiency. But is that the old-fashioned way of stating it? Of all Members in the House I am perhaps as clear on this matter as anybody can be, because it was my lot to be one of a small minority who protested against a system introduced by a Government of which my right hon. Friend was Chancellor of the Exchequer, of raising money for fortifications by the creation of Terminable Annuities, and I argued, as well as I could, that that expenditure ought properly to have been met by the ordinary Supply Vote for the Services. But I was overruled by an enormous majority. The system was introduced against my wishes and counsels. And how has that system been put into operation? Why, in every year but one since its commencement, the practice which I have now adopted has been uniformly followed. It is true that, in the first year for borrowing on account of the fortifications, 1860-61, my right hon. Friend, who was then Chancellor of the Exchequer, stated his Income and Expenditure, with an allowance of £50,000 for fortifications, but in no subsequent year did he adopt that plan. [Mr. GLADSTONE: "Oh, oh!"] Well, will my right hon. Friend state any other year in which that plan was adopted? I have here a statement of the surpluses as stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and as returned to the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt. In these Returns on every occasion the sums spent on fortifications form part of the expenditure, and in no one year, except 1860-61, do the figures correspond with the figures stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In 1863-4 the surplus returned to the National Debt Commissioners was £2,352,000, but the sum stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer was £3,152,000. It is much the same in the subsequent years. If I were to go through every one of these Returns I will venture to say that in no year, except the year I have mentioned, 1860-61, do the figures correspond. Now, has the practice which my right hon. Friend has urged upon us been adopted? I am not saying my right hon. Friend is not right in his criticism, and that we ought not to adopt this plan. But when he asks us not to depart from old-fashioned principles, I have a right to complain that the discovery of novelty in a practice which has been followed by himself and others these 15 years has suddenly flashed upon him when our proposals are laid before the House. I wish he had told us of his views a little sooner. If, last year, when I stated the surplus of the year 1873-4 at £869,000, for which we were not claiming credit ourselves, but were ascribing it to our predecessors, he had said—"Oh, no; you are giving us credit for too much, you ought to have reduced it by the amount borrowed for fortifications," then I might have taken the hint, and would have framed my Estimates this year accordingly. But that did not occur then to my right hon. Friend, and I do not blame him for it: I only wish to point out that when he blames me in this matter he is blaming himself. Then, in bringing the tremendous charge against us of not having called up a certain proportion of Miscellaneous Revenue last year, I think he is hardly measuring out to me quite the same measure which has been measured out to himself and to other persons who have been placed in similar circumstances. I have no doubt the answer which we have heard was given by the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe) to Mr. White was strictly and literally correct. I am not sure that I might not this year have given a similar answer, and been equally correct, because there were certainly no instructions from the Treasury that the India Office payments should not this year have been called in by the 31st of March. In 1872, when the India Office payments to the Treasury were kept back, the amount was more than £800,000. On the present occasion, all I did was on a very much smaller scale. There were two sums which I certainly did not call up as Miscellaneous Revenue, although I might have brought them in before the close of last year. One of them was the remains of the Credit Vote on account of the Abyssinian Expedition. The payment had not been accurately adjusted—had not then been ascertained; and, although I knew that there was a certain sum which might have been called in, I thought it reasonable that it should stand over to the beginning of the year, by which time the actual amount could be fully ascertained. There was also a small sum of £160,000 due by the Indian Government, which, if we had taken steps to call it in, we could have got before the 31st of March; but I frankly told the Committee I did not call it in because I did not very much desire it. At all events, if I did anything wrong, I frankly stated it to the Committee, and I do think that under the circumstances of the case I was justified in what I did. Now, what were the circumstances of the case? Last year I brought forward a Budget in which along with a large remission of taxation I proposed a subvention to local expenditure. At the moment I made my Statement I was not perfectly aware how much of the local subvention would fall to be paid within the financial year. I did not know at what periods the payments to Scotch and Irish police, &c., would fall due, and, as a matter of precaution, I took a round sum, as being the amount which would have to be provided during the year. As the year drew on and we came to ascertain the dates of the various payments, I found there was less to be made last year and more to be thrown on this year than I had calculated. I, therefore, assumed I should have a larger surplus in the Exchequer than was necessary, and that the calls upon me this year would be proportionately larger. Under these circumstances, I did what was nothing very extraordinary or unprecedented, or of which I am in the least degree ashamed—I allowed £300,000 to stand over from one year to the other and to go towards defraying the expense of the metropolitan police and other objects. I think I was perfectly justified in doing it equally with the other case I mentioned. And if I had not mentioned the fact I do not think anybody would have found it out. In these matters I wish to be perfectly frank, and therefore I let the House and the country know exactly what I was doing. My right hon. Friend, of course, has the right to comment upon this, and to say we ought to be more regular in future. We will endeavour to be so. But now I am coming to an important point. My right hon. Friend challenges my Estimate for the present year, and he says—"In the first place you claim to have a surplus of £417,000. But there is £60,000 on account of Brewers' Licences, then there is the interest of £70,000 upon loans, next a large deficit on the Savings Banks, and finally the Vote for Irish education." Well, with regard to some of these items, I do not admit the correctness of my right hon. Friend's observations. The interest on loans had been considered in the calculation which was originally made, and will cover the amount we are likely to require. If a larger amount should be raised we must remember that the interest will be balanced by the interest we shall derive from the advances we shall make, and that this will be carried to the other side of the account as Miscellaneous Revenue. The Savings Bank deficiency, again, will not arise till next year. But taking the Irish Education Vote and any other Supplementary Estimates, no doubt there will be some of the latter which may even absorb the surplus, or even more than absorb it. There is the deduction on the Brewers' Licences of £60,000, and allowing a further deduction for the increase in the charge or Debt of £255,000, which includes £185,000 of the fixed sum, and £70,000 for the local expenditure, the result is a total deduction of £315,000 taken from the surplus of £417,000, which leaves me £102,000 with which to begin the year, with a prospect, undoubtedly, of some further Supplementary Estimates. Well, I have said that my surplus was entirely exhausted, but I did also state that my Estimates were moderate; and although in the Statement I have laid before the House I have only made provision for the Estimates which have been actually laid upon the Table, and not for the sums we shall have to propose in addition, I do anticipate that there will be a further amount of Revenue which will come into the Exchequer in some shape or other, and which will fairly balance any Supplementary Estimates that we may have to propose. Is not that, after all, a common sense view of the case? I was twitted last year with the kind of Budget I then laid before the House. Last year I presented a Budget which was fortunate enough to receive the approval of the right hon. Gentleman himself, in which I set forth in detail the amount I expected to receive from Customs, Excise, and so forth. The result was that, on the whole, the Estimate I then presented was exceeded in the actual returns by something like £500,000. I was justified in the result, and yet I did not satisfy my critics. I was told I was wrong here and wrong there, and that, although I might be right in the totals, I was wrong in the details. Now, I am a student of the newspapers, and I am not above taking advice from any quarter whence it may come, and I am not ashamed to say that I received a valuable hint from the correspondent of one of the leading newspapers, The Times, who writes under the well-known name of "Surplus." In a letter which that gentleman wrote, and which entirely fell in with my views on this subject, he said—

"It is impossible for a Chancellor of the Exchequer, although he may calculate the general outcome, to say what might be advances on particular articles, such as tea, malt, stamps: but let him take courage and make his Estimates as carefully as he can, and then make some allowance for the general spring of the Revenue."

Well, unless circumstances should arise altogether unexpected, I think I am

taking a safe estimate when I say that I may put the supplementary receipts and savings on expenditure—for these must be taken into account—against any Supplementary Estimates that may be required. I may be wrong, and I may be open to criticism next year; but at the present moment I will ask the House to give me credit for having acted, at least, as one who, above all others, will be the sufferer if he makes any mistake. If there should happen to be a deficiency of £100,000 or 200,000, the country will not be a great loser—[“Hear, hear!”]—but it will be a very great loss indeed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer and his credit; and, in spite of the ironical cheer from the right hon. Gentleman opposite, I am staking my own reputation more than any interest of the country upon the sufficiency of the Estimates I have presented. We have heard a great deal about old-fashioned notions, but is it such a very unheard-of thing that a Chancellor of the Exchequer should present a Budget with an anticipation of a very narrow surplus or, possibly, of a deficiency? Why, some 10 or 12 years ago we had cool Estimates presented to us of deficiencies of upwards of £1,000,000, which were to be taken out of the Balances. Is there anything very extraordinary in estimating rather closely on the present occasion, when in former times a Chancellor of the Exchequer got up and said—“I foresee such an amount of expenditure and income, and I leave you with the prospect of a deficiency of £1,200,000,” which ultimately turned out to be something like £2,500,000. [Mr. Lowe: There was £6,000,000 for the China War.] I suspect that if we went into the details of those Estimates there would be a good many things to speak of besides the China War. We were at that time giving away right and left in reduction of taxation; we were reducing duties in this quarter and that quarter. [“Hear, hear!” from the Opposition.] You cheer that. Am I to understand that the argument that we have come to is that it is legitimate to speculate for a deficiency, if you are going to give away taxes; but that it is not right to speculate upon a close fit, if you are going to do something towards paying off Debt? The last, and what may be called the most interesting, part of my right hon. Friend’s remarks filled me with a most profound astonishment. I did not expect that my proposals would, in all particulars, meet the approbation of my right hon. Friend; but I own I did think that the kind of criticism that we have heard on the propositions for the reduction of the Debt would have proceeded from any other Member of this House rather than from my right hon. Friend. His arguments were perfectly new and surprising. He told us that there were three ways of reducing the Debt. The first was to maintain a surplus of Revenue over Expenditure, the second was by a system of Terminable Annuities, and the third was by fixed appropriations. Three ways! I must say I only know of one. Does my right hon. Friend mean to put the maintenance of the surplus of Revenue over Expenditure in contradistinction to any other plan, as if there could be any plan not founded on this principle? Why, that is the old fallacy brought up again, and stamped with the authority of my right hon. Friend. For my own part, I take my stand, and the Government take their stand, on the principle that was embodied in the Report of the Finance Committee of 1828—upon the principle which has been repeatedly impressed upon this House ever since the fallacy of the old Sinking Fund was discovered; and that is, that the only legitimate way of reducing Debt is by maintaining a surplus of Revenue over Expenditure. And if my right hon. Friend means to tell us that he has found any machinery in the form of a juggle or puzzle, in connection with Terminable Annuities or anything else, which does not involve the maintenance of a surplus of income over expenditure, and if he thinks that he is thereby going to reduce Debt, he is only seducing the House into a false track, which ought to be repudiated at the first possible moment. I will do my right hon. Friend the justice to say that I do not believe he meant what he said. What I suppose he meant was, that we might trust to casual surpluses from year to year of Revenue over Expenditure, as contrasted with any fixed principle or system for the reduction of Debt. That must have been the meaning of my right hon. Friend, because it justified what I said—that casual surpluses from 1829 to the present time had only produced a reduction of £40,000,000, against which was to be set an increase of £70,000,000 in loans. On the other hand, I pointed out that the system of the reduction of the Debt by the fixed process of Terminable Annuities had produced the more satisfactory results to which I adverted; and I used the argument to support my proposition that it was not safe, if you wished to do something substantial for the reduction of the Debt, to trust to these casual surpluses from year to year, but that you ought to try some settled plan. That, however, was spoken of by my right hon. Friend as unreal and against all experience, and that was a principle to be condemned! But where is the experience that my right hon. Friend spoke of? He gave us the experience of Lord Bexley, and of the period when, at first £5,000,000, and afterwards £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 a-year, was to be set aside for the Debt. That plan was given up in 1828. My right hon. Friend gave us also the experience of Sir George Cornwall Lewis, which likewise ended in failure. But he did not give us one experience which is more recent and more to the point—he did not give us his own experience. He has been proving that, under the circumstances of the years after the Great European War, the system on which Lord Bexley and other Chancellors of the Exchequer had endeavoured to maintain a fixed appropriation of £5,000,000 was impossible to be carried out. He has reminded us that when the country was burdened with taxation, the primary object was to reduce taxation and relieve the industry of the country; but although the pecuniary arrangements of a Sinking Fund were objected to and were given up by my right hon. Friend, yet he forgot to tell us that we have been living for 10 years under the system of what he now calls a fictitious payment of the National Debt. We have been left by him to provide for the Terminable Annuities which, at his suggestion, we have been paying for the express purpose of extinguishing Debt, and it is just as fictitious and as unreal as any other system. Well, my right hon. Friend may prefer his system to mine; I do not care for that, and I do not quarrel with him for doing so. The system I proposed was an exceedingly simple one, and occupied some 10 minutes to explain, while that of my right hon. Friend was an extremely complicated one, and took up at least a good half-hour. I daresay many hon. Members here will remember the celebrated speech which gave everyone a headache in 1865, when my right hon. Friend brought forward his elaborate plan of Operation A and Operation B, and distinguished the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as Finance Minister from the position of the Chancellor of the Exchequer as banker, and showed how in the one case he might be in a surplus and in the other in a deficiency—that there were cases in which he might be in a special condition to make arrangements which would reduce the Debt. I do not know that he named such very large sums as he did just now, but he named very considerable sums, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) was so enthusiastic on that occasion that he got a Return printed and laid upon the Table, which carried you on to 1888, with a vista of annuities which would be terminable in 1905. I have never been visionary enough myself to go beyond that date; and then my right hon. Friend says with an air, as if he was going to put us all down—"Did you ever hear of a Chancellor of the Exchequer who came forward and proposed taxes in this House for the purpose of keeping up a sinking fund?" Yes, I did. I remember a Chancellor of the Exchequer coming forward and proposing a match tax. I am proposing taxes at this moment to carry out arrangements into which my right hon. Friend himself originally induced us to enter. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] My right hon. Friend shakes his head; but does he mean to tell me that if it were not for these Terminable Annuities which he has set on foot, and which you might be pleased by a very simple operation to put an end to at once—we would be obliged to bear the burden of taxation we are doing? Nothing of the sort. My right hon. Friend and those who sit near him are ready enough to come forward on proper, or, what they think proper, occasions, and say—"See, we have extinguished £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 of Debt every year." Why, Sir, these Terminable Annuities will this year pay £3,700,000 of Debt, and we are proposing taxation to cover that. And, therefore, I say that this system of fixed provision is not new, and is not absurd. It is one which my right hon. Friend has himself proved the efficacy of, and one which experience shows that Parliament will maintain and carry out. [Mr. GLADSTONE again dissented.] Well, my right hon. Friend is the most incredulous man I ever met—he keeps on shaking his head whenever I refer to him; but if the House will not think it too familiar a parallel, I will mention one which suggests itself to me. There is one of Walter Scott's novels in which he introduces a Scotch boy, who informs a gentleman that the Nabob of the story had "given him half-a-crown, charging him not to play it away at pitch and toss. "And of course you disobeyed him?" he was asked. "No," he said, "I didna disobey him, I played it away at neevie-neevie nick-nack." Why, Sir, the difference between the two systems is just about the same as losing the half-crown at neevie-neevie nick-nack instead of at pitch and toss. My right hon. Friend seems to think that my plan is necessarily antagonistic to Terminable Annuities, and that I have a feeling against their operation and principle. I say, not at all, because it is perfectly possible within fixed limits—and I think on certain occasions it will be the right thing to do—to create Terminable Annuities as much as you please, and I believe within those limits it will be a good arrangement to do so. My right hon. Friend has, I think, said—other people certainly have—that I am proposing to reduce Debt with one hand and to contract it with the other. Well, in a very limited sense, that is true; but if you look at the whole of the operations proposed by the Government, in the Bills which we have laid on the Table, you will see that we are putting an end to the various systems which really allow the contracting of Debt. If it is open to assert that we are reducing Debt on the one hand by raising it on the other, I would say that my right hon. Friend and hon. Gentlemen opposite have been for some years going upon the principle of reducing Debt with one hand and raising it on the other with four hands. Now, first, they have been in the habit of borrowing for fortifications, just as we propose within the limits they prescribe to do. They have been paying off Debt by Terminable Annuities on the one hand, and have been raising money for fortifications and adding to the Debt with the other. But not only that—when they have raised £1,000,000, they have not only added £1,000,000 to the Debt, but substantially £2,000,000—£1,000,000 they raised, and they stopped another from going into the Exchequer in the form of a sinking fund to reduce Debt. I will not weary the Committee with the figures, but they show that the amounts expended on fortifications have added to the Debt much more than the amounts raised, because taking the sum raised and the amount deducted out of Revenue, and arriving at the amount you are to hand over to the National Debt Commissioners, you have been robbing the National Debt, and of course strengthening your balances in a way which enabled you to fall back upon those balances to make up a deficiency when occasion required. Then the third hand you have used is this Savings Bank deficiency, which you have allowed to go on increasing, and which we propose to extinguish. I apprehend that there is no more sound or simple principle of finance than this—that, instead of allowing those sums to accumulate as Debt against the nation from year to year, we should come to Parliament and say—"Here are these Savings Banks deficiencies; you choose to allow the depositors in them this amount of interest, being more than your funds will bear; they must, however, be provided for, and we must ask you to vote sums for the purpose." But now what is the fourth hand by which you have been contracting Debt? What is this system of Terminable Annuities? When you turn a Perpetual Annuity into a Terminable Annuity, what do you do? You extinguish a Perpetual Annuity of smaller amount, and you substitute for it a Terminable Annuity for a certain number of years of larger amount, and the difference ought to be such that by investing the amount by which the Terminable Annuity exceeds the Perpetual Annuity, you will at the expiration of the term of years have replaced, and exactly replaced, the money which you had to begin with. Well, but what have you done? If you had gone into the market, and had offered to issue Terminable Annuities and extinguish Perpetual Annuities in their place, no doubt the higgling of the market would have established fair terms. But, for reasons which I need not go into, you did not do that. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his capacity of National Debt Commissioner, or banker, as my right hon. Friend calls it, has made terms with the Chancellor of the Exchequer as Finance Minister, and he has been both buyer and seller of these Annuities, and has fixed the price as he thought fit. But suppose you attempt to operate upon a large scale in that way, what would happen? You extinguish your Perpetual Annuity. You create a Terminable Annuity, and you repay every year a certain amount of capital, which has to be re-invested; but the effect would be to raise the price of the funds, as my unhappy proposal, which has created so much wrath and contempt, has done; so that the money, when it comes back to be re-invested, will not produce the same amount of stock, and consequently there is a loss, and that loss is another way in which I say a false operation has been going on. If you attempt to rest any scheme for the reduction of the National Debt on Terminable Annuities, you will to a certainty produce that effect. You will either make a bargain too favourable and add to the Debt, or you will, on the other hand, make a bargain too unfavourable, and so rob those for whom you are trustees—the Savings Banks depositors; and, therefore, the system is not one on which you ought to rely. I do not, however, say we are not to have Terminable Annuities at all. I am for retaining them to a certain extent, and there are provisions in this Bill to enable you to do so; but to say that that is the only really sound and sensible principle to act upon, and that the other which I propose is unsound and visionary, seems to me to be nothing but gross and sheer prejudice. I am not able to use any other term. Of course, my right hon. Friend regards his own child with different feelings from those with which he regards the child of another; but I must say I was amazed when I heard the propositions laid down by my right hon. Friend. If he has passed over his own peculiarities he has looked into my faults with the sharpness of an Epidaurian serpent. He has done me the honour of looking into the Division List of 1858, and reminding me that I went into the Lobby on the occasion to which he referred with himself and my right hon. Friend at the head of the Government against Sir George Cornwall Lewis. I was then a young Member of the House, and I voted pretty much according to the authority of my two right hon. Friends. But, as the right hon. Gentleman has thought fit to refer to the manner in which I gave my vote on that particular occasion, I should wish to remind him that in a book which I have since written upon the subject I have very freely given my views with regard to that sinking fund of Sir George Cornwall Lewis, and I beg to refer the right hon. Gentleman to my opinions therein expressed. Sir George Cornwall Lewis originated his proposal in a year when a war was raging, and when he was borrowing large sums, and his intention was that his sinking fund should come into operation at the close of that war. The year, however, which he had selected for the sinking fund to come into operation was of a peculiar and very unfortunate character for such an operation. It was not a year of peace, because we were at war in China; the commercial condition of the country was such as to threaten us with a deficiency, and it was also a year when we were bound by an agreement entered into long before to reduce the income tax from 9d. to 7d. in the pound. There were circumstances, therefore, which rendered that year very different from the present, and I refer to it mainly to show that in adopting my proposal we by no means bind future Ministers of Finance. If within two years after Sir George Cornwall Lewis made his proposal for a sinking fund, Parliament was ready to set his scheme aside, is it not perfectly manifest that if times should ever arise when Parliament should think that it is not expedient that my plan should remain in force, the Finance Minister of the day will be bound to come forward and to ask Parliament to set it aside? If you adopt my proposal you will have none of the complications incident to the system of Terminable Annuities—you will have a system of finance which I venture to say will be of a most sound and stable character, because while it establishes a consistent policy of the repayment of Debt, it can be set aside whenever the circumstances of the country require that it should be put an end to. If the country were really in want of money, and taxation could not be increased without injury, the first thing that the Minister of Finance would do would be to put a stop to the system of the repayment of Debt in place of borrowing money. I must apologize to the Committee for having devoted so much of their time and attention to the discussion of this point; but I did so because it was the one which was most pressed upon their attention by the right hon. Gentleman in the last part of his speech. The right hon. Gentleman referred to other matters, which I shall be ready upon the proper occasions to discuss, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not think that I am passing them over because I have thought it right to confine my observations on the present occasion to that part of his speech which refers to my proposal for the reduction of the National Debt.

MR. LOWE: I wish, Sir, in the first place to correct a statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer with reference to what occurred in 1864. I find on referring to the speech of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) in 1864 that he said they must bear in mind that they had incurred certain charges for fortifications, and that both Expenditure and Revenue had included a considerable amount which did not appear in the accounts of previous years. With regard to the charge made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer against the conduct of my right hon. Friend in taking off taxes and yet having a deficit in the same year, I must observe that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) took off the taxes in question in April, and the China War, necessitating the reimposition of those taxes, broke out in the following July, and was one of those unforeseen contingencies which no Minister could guard against. It was, therefore, owing to no fault of my right hon. Friend that the deficiency was incurred. I think that that is a complete answer to the charges which the Chancellor of the Exchequer has brought against my right hon. Friend. But we are not here to answer charges. We are here to arraign the policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and to show the House why the financial proposals of the Government do not merit the confidence of the House. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has argued the matter as though he had not a deficit.

When he made his Financial Statement, he gave the country to understand that he had a surplus of some £417,000; but, in giving us those figures, he entirely left out of sight the large expenditure that will be required for the purposes of Irish Education and other matters of account. But on the faith of those Estimates, he asked the House to sanction the remission of the charge for the Brewers' Licences amounting to £60,000, the payment of £70,000 on account of interest for money borrowed on loan, and his proposal for the repayment of the National Debt, incurring a further expenditure of £185,000. The right hon. Gentleman never ventured to say in so many words that he had not a deficit, and, indeed, I do not know why he should have done so, because he seems to regard a deficit as being just as good as a surplus. The right hon. Gentleman having no money in his pocket, draws upon the negative quantity, and enters upon a far-reaching speculation for the purpose of paying off the National Debt, commencing his operations by borrowing the money to enable him to make a start. Under these circumstances, I really wonder that the right hon. Gentleman took the trouble to deny that he is in debt. Therefore, while the right hon. Gentleman does not venture to say that he has a surplus, I think that we are justified in saying that he has a very serious and considerable deficit, and that it has arisen from the want of serious consideration being given to accounts of income and expenditure. Well, this is after all but a poor affair. But although it is but a poor affair it might have been relieved if he had treated it in a more magnificent manner. We have shown that in a time of profound peace, when no emergency is expected to arise, when we only last year gave the right hon. Gentleman £6,000,000 to play with, and when we are enjoying the result of a splendid harvest, he has been unable to keep us out of a deficit. I really was somewhat ashamed when I saw the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman dealt with and palliated the circumstances of the case. He told us, in the first place, that he had retarded the progress of £300,000 of Indian money which was finding its way into the Exchequer, and he seemed to consider it a matter of no consequence. But surely it is the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to lay before the House the finances of the country as they actually stand, and not as he has manipulated them. Any Finance Minister who adopts the latter course enters upon what was termed some years ago in relation to railway speculations, "a culinary operation" of the most difficult and dangerous nature. Nothing can be more alarming than for it to be publicly avowed that it is the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to manipulate the public accounts so as to show the revenue to be larger than it really is, and our fears would be greatly increased were we to be told that the object of such manipulation was to prevent the necessity of its being shown that there was a large deficit. It may be said that this is a small matter, and that it does nobody any harm; but the first step in such a direction is everything, however little, and if the House consents that the Minister of Finance shall cook and manage the accounts and present that as a fact which is not a fact, we are entering on a course the end of which no man can foresee. The right hon. Gentleman has not only disposed of the £6,000,000 given him last year, but he has also reduced the balances by £1,000,000, and worse than that, what kind of excuses does the right hon. Gentleman set up to cover his proceedings? Why, he says that the Government remitted a great quantity of taxes last year, and that part only of such remission came into operation during the present year, and therefore that he was entitled to consider that a portion of the deficit was a remission of this year. He also said that the coming year is Leap Year, that it contains an extra day, that there is no Easter in it, and several things of that kind, and hopes that things may be better than his own calculations have led him to believe. The right hon. Gentleman in making his Financial Statement appears to have made all kinds of mental reservations instead of telling us exactly what the state of the Revenue was. That is a matter for serious complaint, for if there is anything in the hopes that the right hon. Gentleman now entertains on the subject of the Revenue, he ought to have taken that into consideration before he presented his Estimates to the House. There is nothing more difficult than to fix upon the right hon. Gentleman any specific statement at all. We have had of late years a pretty good time in the way of finance, even without the assistance of the Match Tax. But it seems that whenever the Conservative Party are in power there must be a deficit. After the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury came into office in 1852 he had to deal with a deficit, and, wanting to take off a great portion of the Malt Tax, he laid hold of a Public Works Fund and appropriated it for the purpose. That was his first experiment in finance. Then in 1858 he laid his hand upon the sinking fund, which had been provided by Sir George Cornwall Lewis, and appropriated it as part of the Revenue of the year. Now, the right hon. Gentleman has come in with every conceivable advantage, after a remission of £12,000,000 of taxes and with power to remit £5,000,000 more. We had taken off something like £26,000,000 of Debt; we had paid off £5,000,000 of the Abyssinian legacy that was left us by our Predecessors; we had expended £2,000,000 in the preparations rendered necessary by the War in 1870, and in addition we had paid £3,200,000 of the Alabama Indemnity, all payments of the nature of Debt. In five years, therefore, we had paid off no less than £36,000,000 Debt. If ever a Chancellor of the Exchequer came into office with a good chance of having a surplus and of cutting a respectable figure—if only for the sake of variety—surely it was the right hon. Gentleman. But what has been the result? In the first year the right hon. Gentleman squandered away the whole of the surplus which he found available when he came into office, and the next year he comes before us with a deficit. I think, under those circumstances then, that the right hon. Gentleman would do better if he directed attention to his own defence, instead of endeavouring to carry war into the enemy's country. In a most admirable manner the right hon. Gentleman sought to show that he was still remitting taxes. First, he told us that part of the remissions of last year took effect this year; and, in the second place, he pointed out that relief was given in some respects to local taxation. With regard to the latter circumstance, it is obvious that the money spent in relief of local taxation must be charged upon the Revenue of the country; but according to the logic of the right hon. Gentleman this is remission of taxation—and therefore the more you tax a people the more you relieve them. But what I object to most of all in the right hon. Gentleman is the levity with which he speaks of a deficit. I do not know that this is a place for logical definitions; but if I were asked to define a Chancellor of the Exchequer, I would say he is “an animal who ought to have a surplus.” If—except under extraordinary conditions—he has not a surplus, he fails to fulfil the very end and object of his being. I hold that the want of a surplus in a time of peace—when there is no pressure, no panic, no great distress anywhere—is nothing less than a national calamity. Our position as Englishmen—and I feel it—is lowered by it in the eyes of the world. The right hon. Gentleman has given us a great many reasons why he has not taken off fresh taxes this year. I think he might have spared himself the trouble. It is like the person who could not fire a salute, for 13 reasons—the first being that he had no gunpowder! The Chancellor of the Exchequer having spent every shilling he had, had a good excuse for not taking off taxes. The right hon. Gentleman attached importance to the fact that next year—Leap Year—there would be an extra day, and that, moreover, the Easter festival would not fall within the financial year. Surely these are little calculations, which are more worthy of a retail trader than of a Chancellor of the Exchequer? People sometimes say that we are descending in the scale of nations—that we are not the country we are, and so on. We can still, however, point to many circumstances which prove the contrary, and notably to the rate at which we can borrow money. But if we hold ourselves out to the world, under the auspices of the right hon. Gentleman and his supporters, as caring so little for the credit of the country and for its antecedents that we do not scruple, without any occasion, to present the miserable spectacle of a Financial Statement which does not balance, how can we expect to retain our high position in the eyes of other nations? And if this is what you do when there is nothing threatening, how will it be when there is real danger and pressure? I hold that we are bound, not only as a matter of pride, but as a matter of duty, to give an example to the rest of the world by regularity and propriety in our financial arrangements. With regard to the scheme for the reduction of the National Debt, I maintain that the right hon. Gentleman is introducing into this country a system which, from its own nature, is certain to fail, and which experience has shown to have always failed. Suppose a Chancellor of the Exchequer is asked to take off a tax—the Malt Tax, for instance. He says—“Very well, I will do it; but I must increase another tax.” But then the repealers of the other tax—say the income tax—come forward and make a similar demand, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer may stand by until the two parties fight it out. But suppose, instead of being obliged, if you yield to either of the demands, to increase the taxation in some other direction, there is a fund already provided for the purpose of paying off Debt, how long do you think the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be able to resist the pressure for an appropriation of that fund to the remission of taxation? He will say—“I want to pay off Debt.” But on all sides there will be a cry—“We do not care at all about that.” I should like to read a few lines from Ricardo’s Essay on the Funding System in regard to a sinking fund established in 1716—

“This fund was for some time regularly applied to the discharge of Debt. . . . Soon after, the principle of preserving the sinking fund inviolable was abandoned. In 1733, £500,000 was taken from that fund and applied to the Services of the year. In 1734, £1,200,000 was taken from the sinking fund for current services, and in 1735 it was anticipated and mortgaged. The produce of the sinking fund at its commencement in 1717 was £323,437. In 1776 it was at its highest amount, being then £3,166,517, and in 1780 it had sunk to £2,403,017. . . . On the whole, this fund did little in time of peace, and nothing in time of war, to the discharge of the National Debt. The purpose of its inviolable application was abandoned, and the hopes entertained of its powerful efficacy entirely disappointed.”

That was the experience of the first sinking fund in this country, and it is exactly what would happen now. As long as it is small—and the right hon. Gentleman has not yet contributed anything to it—it will be safe. But let it reach a larger sum, and there are numerous claimants who will try to get hold of it; and the only question will be to whom will the Government of the day make this present that is being provided for them? It is impossible to suppose that it will last. Let us take an instance. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government is now lending his countenance to the project of a sinking fund. Well, in 1855, when Sir George Lewis was Chancellor of the Exchequer, £16,000,000 were lent to the Turks, and £1,000,000 was to be used every year as a sinking fund. Soon after peace was restored, a Conservative Government came into power, and as usual there was a deficit. Then the present Prime Minister was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the right hon. Baronet was Secretary to the Treasury. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: I was not then in Parliament.] The result was, that an Act was passed under the auspices of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) to which I would ask particular attention. By that Act the right hon. Gentleman repealed the sinking fund scheme, and did the very thing which he is now condemning. He resisted in the most solemn manner the bad system of a sinking fund, and yet now he came down to the House to rate those who sat opposite to him because they, in Opposition, ventured to doubt the policy which he had himself so emphatically denounced. The real objection to a sinking fund is that it is a thing made to be robbed. It always has been robbed and always will be robbed, to the end of the chapter, because it is of no interest to the general public to defend it, and in a fight about taxation, with an interested party on the one side and the general public on the other, the general public will always go to the wall. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said, and with truth, that Terminable Annuities have in them something of the nature of a sinking fund. But, as a matter of practice, there is this difference between them—that the nature of a sinking fund, such as the right hon. Gentleman contemplates, is that it should be plundered, while the nature of Terminable Annuities is that they have not been able to be plundered. They have been efficient; they have never been interfered with by Parliament, and although I may be told that it is not logical to object to one and not to the other, I do not care whether it is logical or not; one thing is certain, that is that the country will allow us to do one thing and not the other. By this proceeding the Committee are asked by the right hon. Gentleman to do away with the system, and to destroy the only efficient means that have yet been devised for paying off the Debt. I will not dwell upon the ridiculous position in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer places the House by landing us in a deficit, and then, without a farthing to dispose of, proposing to borrow money in order to initiate a system by which he hopes to pay off £200,000,000 of Debt. The right hon. Gentleman might at least have waited until he had a shilling of his own to commence his operations with. It was urged upon Burke, when arguing the case of America, that we ought to take off the monopoly of trade and the taxation, or neither, because it was not logical to continue to monopolize their trade and not to pay taxes. He said—“I do not care whether it is logical or not. They will submit to the monopoly, and they will not submit to the tax.” That is exactly the case in this instance. I do not care for the logical objections which may be urged against Terminable Annuities; the fact is as I have said, the people of England will inevitably apply the money laid up by the right hon. Gentleman for the purpose of taking off taxes while they will not disturb the Terminable Annuities. Further, the right hon. Gentleman might have been content with landing the House in the discredit of a deficit, without striking a fatal blow which, upon the authority of his own Leader, must inevitably lead to the appropriation of the sinking fund to the necessities of the Government. One small matter I may refer to before resuming my seat—namely, the stoppage of £300,000 in its course into the Exchequer, with regard to which the right hon. Gentleman says he has let matters take their course. It is owing to the right hon. Gentleman's instructions and under his own direction that this most irregular and improper step has been taken. In conclusion, this is the outcome of the whole business—that we have got our finances into a state in which we have not seen them for five or six years, and that the only consolation the Chancellor of the Exchequer has to offer is a number of refined definitions as to the incidence of taxation, the effects of moveable feasts, and other matters of the same nature, and then, having given us this immense boon, he takes measures, so far as human foresight can ascertain, for destroying the only means we possess for paying off the Debt of the country.

MR. HUNT felt when the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. Lowe) rose, that he had a very difficult task before him, because the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had dealt with every conceivable point of attack in the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and his criticism had been so completely answered by his right hon. Friend's speech, that he was sure the right hon. Gentleman had nothing to do but to “Glean the blunted shafts that had recoiled, And aim them”

again at his right hon. Friend. They were charged with having no surplus, and it was quite possible that the Supplementary Vote for Irish Education might almost absorb the surplus after the sinking fund had been provided for; but when it was objected that a Chancellor of the Exchequer ought not to start without a surplus, he would remind the House that in 1871-2 the Chancellor of the Exchequer of that day was content to start with an estimated surplus of only £7,000, from which it appeared that what was then entirely proper was now entirely vicious. True, the actual surplus realized in 1871-2 was £3,218,000, so that, notwithstanding the dismal prospect with which that year began, it closed with a very prosperous state of the Exchequer. Therefore, before right hon. Gentlemen opposite came to the conclusion that the present year would land them in a deficit they should wait until they saw its actual result. With reference to the sums receivable from India, to which allusion had been made, he understood that both in the case of the last as well as the present Government, the receivable Order was sent to the Bank of England one day later than it might have been. Whether the right hon. Gentleman opposite had given directions to that effect he did not know; but the Order was at the Treasury, and he might have made himself acquainted with the fact if he had made inquiry into the matter. In the one instance, then, according to the right hon. Gentleman, the transaction was a most legitimate one; while in the other there was a most flagrant dereliction of duty. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the late Government had left their Successors a very considerable surplus and that they had squandered it. Now, the surplus of last year had been dealt with entirely in the way of the remission of taxation; but while right hon. Gentlemen opposite were apt to boast of all that they had done in that way, they characterized the same operation on the part of their political opponents as squandering a surplus. A great deal of criticism, he might add, had been expended on the subject of the relief which was given to the ratepayers, and no doubt that which had ostensibly increased the expenditure of the country was the subvention in aid of local taxation by which very considerable relief had been afforded. In connection with the subject complaints, which had been admitted on all hands, had been made for years past that certain Imperial charges were placed solely upon a certain class of taxpayers—namely, the local ratepayers; but while the late Government found it necessary to pay attention to that grievance, it was left to the present one to deal practically with it, and he believed the relief felt by the remissions of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been gratefully acknowledged by those who had participated in them. But the main question raised that evening was, whether the proposals of his right hon. Friend with respect to the reduction of Debt were such that they ought to receive the sanction of the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) contended that the plan was one which must fail, inasmuch as sinking funds had always failed with the exception of Terminable Annuities. Well, circumstances altered cases, and the failure of sinking funds, in his opinion, involved the question whether it was necessary in order to support them to impose heavy burdens on the people in the shape of taxation. It was not surprising that when war taxes were pressing on the community a Chancellor of the Exchequer should rather seek to relieve the taxpayer than to provide for the reduction of Debt. That might be his duty, while at another time when the burden of taxation was light the reduction of Debt ought to occupy more seriously his attention. And when the right hon. Gentleman opposite contended that the only form of sinking fund which was of any value was that of Terminable Annuities, he (Mr. Hunt) would ask whether he thought those Annuities would be safe in the event of the pressure of taxation being very great? Nothing could be gathered in answer to that from what had occurred, for it appeared to him that the pressure of taxation had been very much less during the continuance of these Annuities than on former occasions when other forms of sinking fund had been abandoned. He recollected that when he himself was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and had to make provision for the expenses of the Abyssinian War, there were not wanting hon. Members in that House to urge the desirability of breaking in on the system of Terminable Annuities for the purpose of raising the necessary funds. He was, however, enabled, with the support of the House successfully to resist the proposal; but in the event of the breaking out of a war, which should necessitate the imposition of taxes of anything like a grievous nature, he had no doubt that under any system of sinking fund we should be compelled to cease paying off Debt for the period those taxes were required. But, then, the right hon. Gentleman argued that the present was not the time to enter on such a system as that proposed by the Government, because the contribution which it would be possible to make this year in furtherance of it was so exceedingly small—only £185,000. The time was, however, he maintained, an opportune one to make a beginning in the proposed direction, because there was so much less temptation to decide on any other mode of spending the money. The pressure of taxation being by no means grievous, and taxation having of late years been remitted to such an extent in the case of those classes on whom it bore most heavily, it was easier under the circumstances to make a virtuous resolve than it would be in 1885, when the Terminable Annuities would fall in, and when there would probably be a general scramble for the remission of taxes. But the right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the Chancellor of the Exchequer sneered at the system of Terminable Annuities. That, however, was not the impression which he (Mr. Hunt) gathered from the speech of his right hon. Friend. Indeed, he rather thought his right hon. Friend had pointed out that there was a scheme of Terminable Annuities which it might be advisable, under certain circumstances, to adopt; and in his Savings Banks Bill he had taken power to cancel Stock, and to substitute for it something similar to Terminable Annuities. Terminable Annuities had, no doubt, been successful as far as they had gone, but it would, in his opinion, be unwise to tie ourselves merely to that mode of operation. He thought that the matters complained of had been so entirely answered that it was really unnecessary for him to trouble the Committee further, and he hoped that the Committee would assent to the proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. LAING thought the speeches to which the Committee had listened that evening, able and eloquent as they were, partook rather of the tu quoque line of argument, while he was desirous of addressing himself to the question as it bore on sound principles of finance. Considering himself as a financier first, and a politician next, he proposed to enter upon what appeared to him to be a legitimate criticism of the Budget in three aspects, the first of which would be the Budget of the year. That Budget was divided into two parts; one the Financial Statement, the other the scheme for the reduction of the National Debt. His only weighty objection to the first part of the Budget was summed up in the admission of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that there was substantially no surplus, and probably none whatever. The circumstances must be exceptional in which it was not the first duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to provide against possible contingencies. It was a question, not of money, but of credit and security. The commercial classes felt uneasiness at the prospect of a deficit, and a substantial surplus ought to be regarded as a point of honour. The only argument against it was that it encouraged pressure from the Departments, but Government ought to be strong enough to consider demands on their merits. The reason why we found ourselves in our present position, after two years of peace and prosperity, was that remissions were carried so far last year, although he would, in passing, admit that the large reductions previously made by the former Government in the amount of the Sugar Duties had made their total abolition a case of inevitable necessity; yet the reduction of the income tax, notwithstanding the difficulty created for the present Government by the late Prime Minister's promised abolition of it, was much less justifiable; and had it been maintained at 3*d.* instead of 2*d.*, we might now have looked forward to a surplus without reckoning upon the odd day in Leap Year. But for these large reductions of taxation the country would be in a safer position with regard to meeting any emergencies which might arise, and, at the same time, in a position to do more towards reducing the National Debt. The facts showed how injurious it was to import political considerations into our finance. The objections to the proposals for dealing with the Debt were the time and mode of doing it. The difference between a sinking fund and Terminable Annuities was this—a sinking fund was entirely optional, and there was no third party to the contract; but in the case of Terminable Annuities, there was a third party, whose claims could not be got rid of by a stroke of the pen. The old orthodox system of making an impression on the National Debt was to estimate the expenditure well on the safe side, and to apply the surplus to reducing the Debt. If we had resolution to levy £5,000,000 a-year, for that purpose that would be the most straightforward and economical course. Terminable Annuities were only a device for catching the surplus Revenue. The only objection to the sinking fund was we were under no obligation to maintain it. The great danger was, that it looked seductive on paper, and when the amount became large, it was idle to think of pledging any successor as to what he could do with such prodigious sums as would have to be levied by taxation beyond what was actually required for the services of the year. Was it not more desirable that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, 10 years hence, should be as free as the right hon. Gentleman who now held the office to deal with the circumstances that might arise according to what was best for the time? Many of the small assessed taxes were troublesome in comparison with the revenue they produced; and he would not assert that the whole of our system of taxation was so perfect that no question could arise hereafter as to whether it would not be better to reduce taxation rather than pay off Debt. He would say nothing about the Railway Passenger duty; but why should a tradesman's cart be liable to taxation, and did not some of the licence duties require revision? As regarded tea, he supposed that all the arguments which were brought forward for getting rid of or greatly reducing the Sugar Duties would tell equally for the reduction of the duty on tea. Indeed, he thought that no greater boon could be given to one-half of the population—the female half—than the reduction, or, if it could be afforded, the total repeal of the tea duties. There were many causes of increased expenditure looming in the distance, and that was an element in the question. The debates on Army Recruiting showed that the labour market had risen against the Government, and if the security of the country required that the raw material of the Army should be improved, it might be necessary to increase the pay of the soldiers. The debate on horses, too, proved that the cost of mounting our Cavalry and Artillery was increasing. Then, again, it might be possible that in four or five years our military authorities would follow the example of Germany, and substitute breech-loaders for muzzle-loaders, at a cost of, say, £4,000,000. The charge for Education was constantly growing. The Votes for National buildings had been properly postponed for the present year; but if we were to have new Law Courts, a new National Gallery, and a Museum of Natural History, it might, he thought, be true national economy to get them finished without too much delay, so that we might enter upon the use and enjoyment of them at once. All these questions should be left to be considered unfettered by what had been determined upon five or six years before in regard to a sinking fund, and it would be neither wise nor prudent to commit a future Parliament upon the question whether the surplus revenue should go in one direction rather than another. He trusted the House would stand upon the old paths of Conservative finance which had been acted upon for so many years by politicians on both sides—namely, to maintain the old sources of Revenue, to go on with the plan of Terminable Annuities, and if we should chance to have a large surplus two, three, or four years hence to defer the consideration of what should be done with it until that time arrived.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, hemerely rose to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lowe) to the fallacy underlying his argument as to the relative importance of a deficit and a surplus. It was obvious that a Chancellor of the Exchequer would take a sanguine view of the advantages to be derived from a considerable surplus, and he was certain, under ordinary circumstances, to keep his Estimates of Revenue at a moderate amount. The modern position of a Chancellor of the Exchequer under the system of Terminable Annuities was one in which the reduction of Debt ceased to be a source of solicitude to him, as he would only have to provide for the payment of these Annuities, and upon their expiration there would be wiped off the Debt an amount equal to the capital sum they represented. Consequently, he would have no other duty than to give the House a fair view of his revenue and expenditure. The latter was the view taken by his right hon. Friend, and he thought he had shown that it had been not only with perfect frankness, but with thorough honesty of purpose, he had made his Estimates as closely as he possibly could. On the other hand, he entirely understood the view which attached extreme importance to a considerable surplus. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London seemed to consider a large surplus a special evidence of a Chancellor of the Exchequer's fitness for his position. But if that were so, nothing in the world would be easier than to become a most accomplished Chancellor of the Exchequer. The holder of the office would only have to take counsel with those excellent gentlemen the heads of the Revenue Departments, and say to one—What may be your estimate? and if the answer was £21,000,000, he need only say, Write down £20,000,000; to another, write down £5,000,000 instead of £5,500,000, and so on. No Chancellor of the Exchequer could have it absolutely in his power to foresee the prospective Revenue; everything must depend upon the circumstances under which the Budget was made, and the objects which were aimed at. A Chancellor of the Exchequer might go a little above or a little below the mark, and he ventured to think that his right hon. Friend had made an exceedingly good shot. He ventured, therefore, to think that there was no room for the severe censures which had been indulged in on the apparent discrepancies in the financial arrangements of the Government. When those financial arrangements had been made, and the reduction of Debt provided for to such an extent as the House might determine, it was the duty of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to lay before the House as close and accurate Estimates of income and expenditure, and in that respect he was confident the House had now no cause to be dissatisfied.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK said, that his right hon. Friend who had just spoken (Mr. J. G. Hubbard) seemed to overlook the fact that it would not be sufficient on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to under-estimate his revenue in order to ensure a surplus. He would also have to keep down his expenditure; and, therefore, the matter would not be so easy as his right hon. Friend supposed. He thought the House, in conjunction with himself, had listened with great interest to the very able statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he feared they came back to this fact—that they had only a nominal surplus at a period of great prosperity—namely, about £102,000—which would be all swept away by the Supplementary Estimates. While he heartily congratulated the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the results of last year, which were owing to an excellent harvest, he was glad that the Estimates of this year were founded on a different basis. The right hon. Gentleman said he was glad the money was in the pockets of the people and not in his cash-boxes. He had listened to that part of his speech with some regret, and it was quite inconsistent with the latter part of his speech, in which he forcibly pointed out the importance of reducing our Debt. The right hon. Gentleman thought that £28,000,000 should be devoted to the principal and interest of the Debt; but he was obliged to carry out this policy by three yearly increments. Why could he not at once carry out his policy? He was prevented from doing so by his Budget of last year. It seemed, therefore, inconsistent that the right hon.

Mr. Laing

Gentleman should congratulate himself on that Budget. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London had referred to past precedents which appeared to satisfy them that the Debt was not likely to be reduced by a fixed annual sum. But the circumstances of the present period were different from those of the previous periods, and he was, therefore, on this point, more disposed to take the view of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The pressure of taxation was now much less than formerly, and the public opinion of the country had been educated on the subject. There was, however, this objection to both plans—that they did not bring prominently before the minds of the public the great advantage of reducing Debt. He believed that if not only the interest of the Debt was paid, but also an appreciable portion of the principal each year, the public would see by the annual burdens becoming less and less each year, the real advantage and importance of extinguishing the Debt.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had deliberately come forward and proposed a definite plan by which they might make some practical inroad upon the National Debt, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman must have been greatly encouraged by the support he had received from all parts of the House. During the last 47 years, notwithstanding the public income had increased 65 per cent, at the same time that the amount of taxation had been diminished, we had only paid off £160,000,000 of our Debt, while we had added to it £73,000,000. The plan brought forward by the Chancellor of the Exchequer would avoid an annual Vote and annual discussion of the sum to be set aside; it was a most practical one, and one which the country always received favourably in times of peace. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich found fault with it; but why had he not proposed a better plan when he controlled the finances of the country at periods of unexampled prosperity? When the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich promised the nation the magnificent surplus of £6,000,000 on the eve of the last General Election, he made no allusion to the repayment of any portion of the National Debt. Parliament had been legislating with the view of educating the people and of teaching them to be provident and self-denying; but if they wished their recommendations to have any effect, they must begin by setting the people a good example by providing for the repayment of the National Debt while the country was prosperous and we had the power of doing so. He was not sorry the income tax had been retained, as it was a most reliable source of Revenue, and it did not press hardly on any one at the present time. The country saw that there must be a certain amount of direct taxation, and they preferred the income tax to an enormous increase in the legacy and succession duties, which it was generally understood was the way in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich intended to recoup the Exchequer for the loss of the income tax. He entirely approved the proposals of the Government with reference to the relief of local taxation; while by their scheme in connection with the local loans, much benefit would be conferred upon the country. The financial measures of the Government would be of great practical benefit, and he trusted that the House would confirm the favourable verdict given by the country on the Budget.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, he felt bound to protest against the unjust and unfair attack which had been made upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer in reference to the Exchequer balances left out of income after meeting all charges. It was in every way advantageous to the country to have a Chancellor of the Exchequer working on close estimates, whether of income or expenditure. There was no measure more conducive to exactness and regularity than that of enforcing accurate Estimates. The mere fact of showing that there was no surplus income available for the wants of Departments, effectually prevented the sending in of Supplementary Estimates for additional expenditure. No doubt this bad practice was not only stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the late Liberal Government to be unavoidable; but no one acquainted with departmental arrangements could have heard this avowal with any other feeling than that of regret, and might well lead to the report that, on hearing it, the late Prime Minister left the House. No doubt, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer had appropriated the income derived from the whole nation in aid of local taxes for local purposes, and in a way which he could not approve of; but he must admit that, in affording some relief to local taxation, the right hon. Gentleman had only acted in conformity with the desire of the Conservative Party. Had the right hon. Gentleman, however, instead of affording that direct relief out of the Consolidated Fund, merely handed over to the local authorities certain taxes, such as the tax on male servants, on carriages, on armorial bearings, also the gun and dog tax and even the publicans' and other local licences, he would not have laid himself open to the reproach of having increased the expenditure of the country, and would have been spared the reproach of adding to the dangerous practice, previously in force, of powerful parties putting their hands into the Treasury chest of the nation to use public funds for local purposes. The principle which the right hon. Gentleman had adopted of only retaining a small surplus was a very wise and prudent measure, because it would prevent premature attacks being made on the Revenue of the future, and would make all the Departments of Government very cautious in their expenditure. He saw no great objection to the plan of the right hon. Gentleman for the reduction of the National Debt, and he thought that the right hon. Gentleman was not open to the censure and blame which had been cast upon him by right hon. Gentlemen who had attacked his proposals. No doubt the old practice of 150 years of meeting debts by Terminable Annuities was a wise mode of concealing payments for debt; but if the nation would bear a direct charge, as proposed, then it might be tried until the people called for a return to the annuity system.

MR. W. S. STANHOPE said, he also wished to express his warm approval of the financial scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, which would preclude any scramble for the large sum that would fall in during 1885. In 1853 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich had commenced to speculate upon the falling in of the Long Annuities in 1860; but when the latter year arrived, instead of the income tax being repealed, it had reached the high figure of 10*d.* in the pound. He took credit to the Conservative Party for having originated the system which for a considerable time had been gradually reducing the Debt; but, at the same time, he acknowledged that that system had been supplemented and honestly carried out by the late Government. It seemed to him, however, that a yearly appropriation of a fixed sum of money out of which to reduce the Debt was the simplest and most straightforward way of proceeding. This policy might be of vital importance in future generations. We owed much of our commercial superiority among nations to the abundance of our coal supplies, and when coal became scarce—as there was reason to fear it some day might—it would be well if the country had not to bear the burden of a heavy National Debt. With regard to taxation, he would suggest to his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the dog tax might not, with great advantage to the public safety, be increased, so that by limiting the number of those animals, it might have its due effect in repressing the fearful malady of hydrophobia.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, it was his intention, in the few remarks he had to offer to the Committee, to address himself to the scheme contained in the Resolutions of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. As regarded the general character of that scheme, he thought the Committee had little else to do than to accept or to reject it in toto. There were in it, no doubt, things to affirm or applaud, and others that might not be so satisfactory to some hon. Members; but, as he had said, the scheme was one which should be accepted or rejected in toto. What he wished mostly to urge, however, was this—That if this scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was intended to bind future Parliaments and future Chancellors of the Exchequer to the allocation of any particular surplus for future years, it was amenable to many objections, some of which had been very ably stated by the right hon. Member for Greenwich; but if it went no further than to propose a plan which might be acceptable to the present views of Parliament, and which might be approximated to or departed from, as they thought fit, hereafter, it appeared to him to be about as good as any scheme which had been launched in previous years. With regard to the efforts made for the reduction of the National Debt, he would only observe that if the whole of the reductions by Terminable Annuities were to be capitalized that they would not amount to more than the additional taxation raised in Ireland since 1841. He said that as an Irish Member, and he would strongly object to having any stereotyped scheme recognized by Parliament, that should bind them in their future contributions to the Imperial Exchequer. On the other hand, he admitted it was desirable that Parliament should place the country on short allowance with respect to the use of its surplus revenue in prosperous years. To that extent, perhaps, Terminable Annuities were preferable to other modes of reducing the Debt. He did not know that there was so much difference between the two schemes, the more so as, in principle, they were what every prudent householder practised—namely, the laying by of a small sum periodically that a larger one might return afterwards. With regard to the amalgamation of the old Savings Banks with the Post Office Savings Banks, he looked on that as a highly critical and dangerous operation. Some of the old Savings Banks were among the best managed institutions in this country or in Ireland. It had been a principle with Conservative Governments to treat existing institutions as tenderly as possible; and he believed that a great feeling of insecurity would arise in many places where the old Savings Banks had a great hold, if the proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer were adopted with any view to merge them in the Post Office system, but he did not understand the right hon. Baronet to propose taking that step.

MR. BIRLEY said, he approved of the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because it appeared to him to be plain and simple in its character, moderate in its compass, and that it would come into operation at an early period. The right hon. Gentleman, he thought, had satisfactorily disposed of the question of Terminable Annuities in one of the best financial expositions which he had ever heard. That able speech by which, as he might say, the right hon. Gentleman had enraptured the House, had to his mind completely disposed of the charges which had been brought against his financial administration by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The charge, especially that extravagance was the normal fault of Conservative Ministers, came with a very bad grace from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich, seeing that he had in his hand a paper while he was making that charge which showed that the last year of his own administration of the finances of the country was one in which the expenditure had been the largest known for several years. It was possible, of course, as had been contended, that the scheme of the Government for the reduction of Debt might before the lapse of 30 years have to undergo considerable modifications; but even were it to continue in operation for only nine or ten years, it would do much good by enabling us to borrow money on much more favourable terms than would otherwise be the case, besides committing us to a course of continued economy. Among many topics which had been adverted to in the debate was the probable duration of our coal fields. There had been several estimates of that duration, none of which had been very satisfactory; but he wished to observe that he had once read in an old book that England was doomed to commercial extinction with the extinction of her forests, when she would no longer be able to build ships to compete with foreign countries on the ocean. That apprehension had been so completely falsified, that it might very well be that the apprehension founded on the limited duration of the coal supply might be just as ill-founded. As to the amalgamation of the Savings and Post Office banks, he understood it was the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer not to take entire possession of the money in those banks, but simply to consolidate the accounts, and the security would remain as good as ever.

MR. PEASE admitted that the Estimates of the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the last year were practically correct; but when he now, without any surplus, talked of Supplemental Estimates, and looked to something to "turn up" in order to meet them, he was reminded of the language of Mr. Micawber, a policy which he thought was one that would not be highly approved by the country. If, too, the right hon. Gentleman wished to reduce the National Debt, he ought, he contended, instead of tying the hands of future Chancellors of the Exchequer by the scheme which he proposed, to have set down the amount required in his Estimates. That was the proper way to deal with the matter, for then the House would have the real state of the case from time to time before it, and would be in a position to decide whether, under the circumstances, it would back up the Finance Minister in his proposals or not. That, in his opinion, would be a more business-like mode of dealing with the question than the plan suggested by the Government.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, however desirable it might be to reduce the Debt, the backbone of the whole business would be the imposition of new taxes to meet the exigency. He quoted a letter he had received deprecating the annual scramble of interests for any surplus, and advocating the bold appropriation of surplus to reduction of Debt as a policy which would be approved by all intelligent classes. At present our danger lay in giving up taxes and in deceiving ourselves by fine words. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich would not deceive others, nor be deceived by them; but did he not sometimes impose upon himself? We were led away by metaphors. Under the cry of "The last rag of Protection" we gave up a registration duty on corn, which was not felt, and the duty on timber; other taxes were yielded up as being "taxes on knowledge," or to meet demands for a "free breakfast table," and the income tax had been very nearly shipwrecked by talk about "lightening the springs of industry." He would suggest a new tax to be imposed on phrases and metaphors; it would produce a considerable income, and a large part of it would be paid by Members of the House. The proposal of the Government as to the Debt was objected to as binding future Parliaments. There was no danger of doing that; we could not do it. The duty of all who desired the welfare of the country was not to lose sight of the importance of reducing the Debt; and, although each reduction might be small, the effect on the credit of the country would be great, particularly at a time of emergency. So long as the credit of the country was good there would be no difficulty in raising money at a low rate of interest.

MR. W. SHAW said, he had heard nothing to change his first impression that the Budget was a business-like Financial Statement, and, although exception might be taken to the scheme for reducing the Debt, he defied any Chancellor of the Exchequer to produce a scheme that would not be open to objection. He would suggest for consideration an income tax on a graduated scale, believing that persons with £1,000 a-year or more would not object to an extra penny in the pound if the proceeds were to be applied to the reduction of that Debt, in the creation of which the working classes had no voice. He would further suggest that the local loan system should be expanded and also extended to Ireland. An Imperial guarantee assisted a metropolitan loan materially. Why should not local loans be partially guaranteed by the Government?—say, to the extent of £60,000,000 of the total of £80,000,000. Then, instead of local authorities borrowing at 5 per cent, the Government would be able to borrow the money at 3½ per cent and to lend at 4 or 5 per cent for local improvements offering a substantial security, and thus, while promoting the reclamation of waste lands and sanitary reforms, secure at the same time a profit to the Exchequer. In that way alone very considerable local relief would be afforded; and if the loan system, so improved, were extended to Ireland, that country might obtain some of the spoil, of which at present its share would be very small indeed. The cost of the Army might be materially reduced, with benefit to the soldiers, by finding them useful employment. He had observed the temptations to which the men were exposed by idleness, when within a short distance of the barracks there was reclaimable land which would have paid for any labour they might have bestowed upon it.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE wished the Chancellor of the Exchequer had operated on the National Debt last year when he had a substantial surplus in hand. He begged to thank the right hon. Gentleman for his statesmanlike speech on the National Debt, and he also congratulated him upon having no surplus. He could not help thinking that there was some danger in the modern plan, not simply of reducing taxes, but year after year of abolishing them altogether. It seemed to him therefore that a check upon prosperity such as we had had in the last few years would be most salutary. Chancellors of the Exchequer, drunk with success, had year by year remitted taxation until we had almost come to this—that all taxes would be abolished owing to the coffers of the Chancellor of the Exchequer being so full. There was, however, this remarkable feature in the finances of late years—that not only had taxes been lessened, but entirely remitted, the effect being to make the sources of our supplies become annually smaller and smaller. Not a single new tax had been imposed of late years, and nothing less than the unbounded prosperity we had recently enjoyed would suffice to maintain our present expenditure. A large proportion of our Revenue was raised from beer and spirits, and it was taken for granted that the people's taste for those liquors would continue. But revolutions in taste were not very rare, and it was possible that while the taste for beer might remain, the consumption of ardent spirits might undergo a great change and diminution. At all events, there was some danger in allowing so large a portion of our Revenue to rest upon a basis of national vice—upon what might be called a tax upon vice and drunkenness. Under these circumstances, it would be prudent to lessen the national liabilities as much as possible. No parallel could be found either in ancient or modern times to the prosperity which this country had enjoyed during the last few years; but what ground was there for supposing that it would always last? Our prosperity and wealth depended, for example, in the first degree upon our getting a cheaper supply of coal than other nations, and without this the whole fabric of our prosperity might crumble away. The relations between masters and workmen in this country were in anything but a satisfactory position, yet the whole of our material prosperity depended upon the continued exercise of temper and tact between two great rival organizations. He rejoiced that the National Debt was to be systematically reduced, as he believed that its reduction would promote the prosperity of the people, and he thanked the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the resolution he had arrived at in reference to the income tax, one of the least injurious and unjust of our imposts, and which had done such great things for the country in the past, and would materially assist in lightening our load of debt in the future.

MR. DODSON said, that reference had been made by the hon. Member for Bandon (Mr. W. Shaw) to the subject of local loans for the accommodation and benefit of Ireland. He (Mr. Dodson) had no objection to the granting of such loans with proper security, but would remind the House that anyone who had looked into the Report of the Committee on Public Accounts would see that the country had many bad debts arising from local loans. He, however, would not say in what part of the United Kingdom the greater part of these bad debts were to be found. The hon. Gentleman who had just spoken (Mr. Butler-Johnstone) was happy that there was no surplus. He ought to be extremely happy, because, according to the figures of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, it was likely that, instead of a surplus, there would be a deficit. The hon. Gentleman had spoken of revenue derived from vice and drunkenness, and he (Mr. Dodson) himself hoped to see the day when the revenue from spirits would be diminished by increased habits of sobriety on the part of the people; but when the hon. Gentleman spoke of a tax upon vice, he feared he was about to bring the House back to the days of Dean Swift, when it was suggested that there should be a tax upon people's vices and virtues, and that people were to estimate their own virtues and their neighbour's vices. With reference to the past Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, there was one part of the criticism to which it had been subjected in which he never had joined—namely, that his estimate of Revenue would not be realized. Nor did he now join in the cry of those who found fault with the right hon. Gentleman because his estimate of the different branches of the Revenue did not come out in the manner he anticipated. The right hon. Gentleman, or any other person filling the same position, had to estimate as well as he could the amount to be obtained from the different sources of Revenue; but it was an absolute certainty that when he had made the best Estimates he could, some of those sources would produce less, and others more than the expected amount. If the results in the main came out right, there was no use in complaining. More especially was that the case with regard to the Customs and Excise. The Excise had disappointed the right hon. Gentleman's anticipations, but the Customs had exceeded them; and he could not be found great fault with for that, because, after all, the Excise and Customs were cognate branches of the Revenue. But there was another branch which stood separately and on a different basis—namely, the Stamp Duties, which depended upon the prosperity of the country, and not upon the consuming power of the masses. It was in this branch that the greatest failure had arisen. The right hon. Gentleman reckoned upon an income from Stamps of £330,000 above that of the preceding year, and actually realized £10,000 less; and he (Mr. Dodson) should be glad to know to what cause that unexpected shortcoming was attributed? The right hon. Gentleman anticipated that the coming year would be a good financial year because it would have fewer holidays than the past year; but were fewer holidays favourable to the consumption of articles from which a large revenue was derived? The right hon. Gentleman seemed to look forward with a light heart to the Supplementary Estimates to be presented; but he (Mr. Dodson) thought their effect would be to sweep away the surplus of £102,000 to which the Chancellor of the Exchequer had reduced himself. Last year, the Supplementary Estimates amounted to £1,654,000, and the excess of expenditure over the normal estimate of the Budget was £1,426,000. Out of that amount £512,000 was given in aid of local rates, instead of £1,010,000 as promised, and yet on the year there proved to be an expenditure of £914,000 in excess of the Estimate. If the right hon. Gentleman had only the ordinary Supplementary Estimates of £300,000 or £400,000 to provide for this year, the balance would be on the wrong side. To what was he trusting to meet the Votes for Irish Education and the Supplementary Estimates? Was he trusting to the increment of Revenue above that of last year? He had discounted that in the total Estimates of Revenue he had given, for he had taken increments amounting in the aggregate to £986,000. No doubt this was much less than the increment of Revenue he reckoned upon last year which, after deducting the Sugar Duties and taking 1*d.* off the income tax, amounted to £1,533,000. The right hon. Gentleman had, however, deliberately stated his estimated increments from the different branches of his Revenue for the coming year; could it be that to meet the Supplementary Estimates and other expenses he was secretly trusting to increment upon increment? If he was doing that, he (Mr. Dodson) did not think it was a prudent or a fair course to pursue towards Parliament. The Chancellor of the Exchequer being, however, according to the figures he had laid before the House, in an impecunious state, in the face of his difficulties, proposed a gigantic scheme for the reduction of the National Debt. This, if carried out, might produce the greatest amount of reduction of Debt ever yet attempted; but before he did that, he ought to be in a position to give the House some earnest of his sincerity by flinging into the gulf some surplus of his own, and not merely cut off the prospective surpluses of his successors. He (Mr. Dodson) did not, however, think the right hon. Gentleman would be successful in inducing future Chancellors of the Exchequer, and especially the Chancellor of the Exchequer of 1885, to follow his lead, any more than the fox who lost his brush in the trap induced his comrades to part with theirs. The right hon. Gentleman sneered at the system of Terminable Annuities, but he had last year created a batch of them, and now proposed a scheme which was equally expensive and far less permanent. Terminable Annuities, like a fixed apportionment of capital for payment of debt, involved a present burden for the value of future relief. Terminable Annuities were looked upon, however, as a contract with someone or other, and experience showed that they were respected. A fixed apportionment never had long proved tenable, and in this case the result would be that some future Chancellor of the Exchequer, if not the right hon. Gentleman himself, would ask the House to set his plans aside. The Government, in fact, was only adding one more good intention to those with which the floor of this House and of another place was popularly said to be paved. Last year, the right hon. Gentleman had a magnificent surplus; but instead of throwing that into the gulf for the purpose of reducing the National Debt, he applied it to making things pleasant all round. Now he proposed to be virtuous at the expense of his successors. "The system of paying off Debt by fixed appropriations was false in principle, injurious in practice, and one to which the wisest men were adverse." Those, however, were not his (Mr. Dodson's) words but the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire in 1858.

MR. SAMUDA said, he approached the subject as an ordinary man of business, and as such thought that, notwithstanding the intricate and elaborate web which had been woven round it by his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich, the subject of the reduction of the Debt was really a very simple one. To set aside a fixed sum to discharge Debt which had been incurred was the course which naturally commended itself to any prudent man who had the misfortune to get into debt or difficulty. This was what the Chancellor of the Exchequer now recommended, and he could not see that there was any substantial difference between that plan and the system which had been adopted by the late Government. He (Mr. Samuda) had turned the matter over in his own mind no end of ways, and had even brought a proposal on the subject before the House, in which he had suggested that the Debt should be cleared off by means of annuities for 99 or 100 years. Such a scheme had some recommendations, and for an immediate expenditure of £500,000, in 100 years the country would be able to extinguish £100,000,000 of debt. But all these proposals came to the same thing in the end—and he was disposed to be contented with the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which was to his mind a very proper and wise one. In regard to the Income Tax, he suggested that, on account of the difficulties connected with it, and the evil effect it had in inducing deceit, it might be well to rely upon a Property Tax in its stead. He believed the fear that this would give an undue advantage to persons engaged in trade was quite unfounded.

MR. CHILDERS said, the debate had ranged over three principal subjects—namely, the state of the account for last year, the Budget Estimates of Income and Expenditure for the present year, and the scheme proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer for permanently reducing the Debt. As to the first, it was a point of importance to notice, that whereas for many years past there had been a surplus of Revenue over Expenditure applied to the reduction of the National Debt, during the last year there had been no such surplus whatever so applied. A Return for which he had moved showed that although during the last five years no less than £3,200,000 a-year had been applied to the reduction of the Debt, or nearly £16,000,000 altogether, irrespective of the reduction through Terminable Annuities, during 1874-5 the sum applicable to the reduction of the Debt was nothing whatever. It was said that something would have been so applied, but that the Chancellor of the Exchequer at the end of the year had authorized a certain sum that would naturally have come into last year's account to come into the account for the present year; and thus nothing was left available for the reduction of the Debt last year. But the explanation given that night by the right hon. Gentleman as to the grounds on which he authorized that transfer to be made was inconsistent with his statements to the House last year. In his Budget Speech last year, the right hon. Gentleman said he anticipated a very large payment on account of the reduction of local taxation; before the end of the Session he discovered that a considerable part of that sum would not come in course of payment during the financial year; and in connection with that discovery he placed an amended Budget before the House, including considerable Supplementary Estimates for ordinary services, and less aid to local taxation. But on that occasion he gave no hint that he proposed, in consequence of this diminished aid to local taxation, to hold back any part of the Miscellaneous Revenue. Anyhow, not one farthing last year went directly to the reduction of Debt—a striking satire on the Chancellor of the Exchequer's profession. With regard to the payments in respect of fortifications, he had referred to the debates of 1864, 1865, and 1866, and he found that in the Financial Statements of each of those years, his right hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich expressly named the amounts, and stated the surplus both ways, both including and excluding these payments.

The non-statement of those sums last year concealed—he did not use the word offensively—from the House the fact that, so far as the surplus applicable to the reduction of Debt was concerned, instead of a surplus there was a deficit, and that the first deficit for six years. The consideration of that fact afforded the strongest reason why the estimated surplus for this year should be carefully scrutinized. Now, the nominal surplus was £417,000. Against that there came the following charges:—There was £60,000 on the Brewers' Licences; then £70,000 on account of the interest on the Debt contracted for local purposes; then £120,000 on account of the deficient interest in regard to the old Savings Banks; and £118,000 on account of the Irish Education Vote, which was not a Supplementary Estimate but an omitted Estimate, and a further sum would have to be added to that £118,000. Those items swallowed up the whole of the surplus before they came at all to the sum which the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to apply to the reduction of the Debt. It had been suggested that the deficient interest on the Savings Bank account might fall on 1876-7, but he maintained that it could not, under the Bill brought in by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, be fairly excluded from the account for the present year, 1875-6. If that were so, it was perfectly plain that the balance, according to the estimate of his right hon. Friend, at the end of the financial year would not amount to more than £50,000. Was it possible, he would ask, that in a year of profound peace the House could accept, as satisfactory, Estimates which started with either a deficit or a surplus of £50,000? But the Chancellor of the Exchequer suggested that there might be some further increase of the Revenue to the extent of £500,000, out of which he would be enabled to meet the Supplementary Estimates for which he would have to make provision. Now, he for one, protested against the doctrine, which had been this Session, he believed, broached in the House for the first time, that a Chancellor of the Exchequer might, after the lapse of a few weeks from the day when he had stated what the Estimates of Revenue and Expenditure were, come down and say that he expected to get £500,000 more money. It was perfectly impossible to have a true system of finance if a Chancellor of the Exchequer might in the course of a few days vary his Estimates in that way. But, in a Return for which he (Mr. Childers) had moved as to the probable amount of the reduction in the amount of the National Debt for the next few years, he found that the right hon. Gentleman had taken credit for the very £500,000 which he was now proposing to appropriate as an unappropriated surplus. In the account which had been laid on the Table on the 20th of April were two columns—the one showing the amount of stock which it was proposed to purchase out of the fixed charge of £28,000,000, while in the other the surplus of Revenue over Expenditure, including this charge, was given at £500,000. If such loose Estimates were accepted by the House, he could only say that it would be doing that which it had never done in past times. Having made those remarks with reference to the accounts for the present year, he wished to say a few words with respect to the main proposal of the Government for the reduction of the National Debt. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to reduce within a period of 30 years the Public Debt by over £200,000,000. Well, that was the statement which had so impressed the public mind, who believed that a third of the Debt would be redeemed in the course of a short time, that in a few days after the announcement was made there was an extraordinary rise in the Funds. Now, he had moved for a Return which contained the figures showing how the scheme was to be carried into effect. The proposal of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was that, by the process practically of compound interest there would be applied stated sums rising from £275,000 to £960,000 during the next 10 years annually to the reduction of the National Debt—sums amounting altogether to £6,795,000, or something over £600,000 a-year. The right hon. Gentleman at the same time anticipated that the normal surplus of income over expenditure would yield £500,000 a-year, or £5,000,000 for the 10 years. Putting those two sums together, he expected to reduce the Debt during the next 10 years by the sum of £11,000,000, or rather more than £1,000,000 a-year. That was the first part of the right hon. Gentleman's scheme. Let the Committee bear in mind, then, that all that was proposed was, that by the ordinary operation of the sinking fund of 1829 and the new sinking fund, there should be applied about £1,100,000 a-year during the next 10 years with the same object; the fact being that the sum which had actually been thus applied to the reduction of Debt during the five preceding years was no less than nearly £16,000,000, or more than £3,000,000 a-year, so that the grand scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, even upon his own showing, was to apply £1,100,000 to the reduction of the Debt by two methods, through the employment of one of which only by the late Government, no less than £3,000,000 a-year had been so applied during the previous five years. In 1885 and 1886 Terminable Annuities would fall in to the amount of between £5,000,000 and £6,000,000 and the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed that the whole sum should be applied to the reduction of the Debt, and that we should this year pass an Act under which, in about 20 years afterwards, or in 1904, there should be appropriated to the reduction of Debt, from the ordinary excess of income over expenditure, a sum of £14,300,000. Therefore, the scheme came to this—that for 10 years the appropriation towards the Debt was to be one-third of what it had been in the past, and then it was suddenly to be enormously increased. Was it possible the Legislature would venture to lay down that in 1904, £14,000,000 of the National Debt should be paid off by taxes? No Parliament was ever asked before to bind itself and its successors to take £14,000,000 out of the taxes to reduce the Debt. This part of the scheme was impossible. The Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to think that, in comparing the reduction in the next 10 years with that of the past five, he had included in the latter the operation of the Terminable Annuities. Not at all. During the last five years the Debt had been reduced by Terminable Annuities to the amount of £16,000,000; and, by the two processes together, by the sum of £6,420,000 a-year—a very respectable amount indeed, and as much as the country could be fairly expected to contribute. Therefore, he repeated, what the Government were proposing to do, under cover of a magnificent scheme, was to apply at first a much smaller sum than had been applied during the last five years, and to apply enormously increased sums afterwards. Was it reasonable to start such a scheme, at a time when we had no surplus? Why should this plan be preferred, when it was known to be vicious in itself, to have broken down in the past, and to be more likely to promote extravagance than economy? The demerit of the scheme was, that it purported to apply sums of money to the reduction of the Debt before it could be known whether they were applicable; it involved operations in the dark. The only way in which we could satisfactorily attack the Debt was by keeping expenditure well within income, and applying the difference, when it was ascertained, to either temporary or permanent reduction. There were two plans of operating upon the National Debt—one by the Sinking Fund under the Act of 1829, and the other by the process of Terminable Annuities. It appeared, from a Return for which he had moved, that the amount of permanent stock in the hands of the Government was £98,000,000, and that sum might be operated upon so as to produce Terminable Annuities to almost any extent required. Depend upon it, the only way of permanently maintaining fixed charges for the reduction of the Debt was by means of Terminable Annuities; and when the Chancellor of the Exchequer had a reasonable, well-ascertained, actual, and available balance, he should use it for such conversions. What he complained of at present was, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was building up another Sinking Fund on a surplus which he had not got; while the real way to reduce the Debt was, when there was a real surplus, to use it to connect the funds in the hands of the public Departments. He regretted that the plan of Terminable Annuities should have been prejudiced by the speech and plan of the right hon. Gentleman; and he still hoped that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would lay before the House some proposal for dealing effectively with the Debt by Terminable Annuities, and not ineffectively by this shadowy return to an exploded system.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he thought he might congratulate his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer upon the fact that although there had been no lack of effort to place his financial proposals in no very favourable light before the Committee, they had as a whole met with very general acceptance. The objections raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) divided themselves into two heads; first, that his right hon. Friend had attempted to deal with the Debt by means of a sinking fund when there was no balance available for that purpose, and further, that he was dealing with the Debt by a method which was foreign to the experience of late years. He (Mr. W. H. Smith) could not but be surprised at objections being made to proposals now, when no new taxes were being imposed, which were made practically to establish an equilibrium in the finances of the country, when only three years ago proposals were made to, and sanctioned by, the House, which left the Chancellor of the Exchequer with a surplus of £7,000 only. Great stress had been laid upon the fact that the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimated only for a surplus of £500,000, but did the Chancellor of the Exchequer five years ago estimate for a surplus to be applied in the reduction of Debt? For his own part, he thought his right hon. Friend had taken a moderate estimate, and one that was correct, in assuming that the taxation of the country would bear the charges upon it, and leave that amount of surplus. Was there any probability, so far as the statements made in that House were concerned, that in one year there would be a surplus of £6,000,000, in another of £2,000,000, in another of £5,500,000. If there had been, he believed those sums would have been, not applied towards the reduction of Debt, but in the reduction of taxation. His right hon. Friend opposite had spoken in strong terms about the contracts made as to Terminable Annuities. But what did those so-called contracts consist in? In this, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in Downing Street wrote to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Old Jewry representing the National Debt Commissioners requesting that a certain sum of money should be converted into Terminable Annuities. The result was, that at the present time a sum amounting to £3,707,000 had been paid off the National Debt; but objection had been taken that that arrangement was a very good one as far as it was a contract between the Chancellor of the Exchequer in Downing Street and the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Old Jewry; but that if an Act were passed it would be a much more easy process to get rid of the Act, than when pressure arose to get rid of a charge which by a similar Act of Parliament might be re-converted into Perpetual Annuities again. For his part, he had no doubt that if a time of pressure came, the one Act would be quite as secure as the other. But there was this vice with respect to Terminable Annuities, that it was impossible to tell at what price they could buy back the Stock, or whether the funds of the Savings Banks would, at the end of the operation, result in a sum of money which would fairly represent the sum at which they were converted in the first instance. It had been said, as an objection to the policy of Her Majesty's Government, that there had been no reduction of Debt last year. But one of the provisions of the Budget was, that £500,000 should be applied to raise £7,000,000 of Terminable Annuities, and that amount of Debt would be extinguished in 1885. [Mr. Dodson: That was derived from interest on local loans, which was not Revenue.] It was the first time he had ever heard that interest did not become Revenue. The interest in question was appropriated in former years to the Balances; but from this time forward it would go in reduction of the National Debt, and he claimed that it was a distinct advance in the principle of sound finance, that income should be applied to definite purposes previously assigned by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the House of Commons. What his right hon. Friend proposed was, that a fixed sum of £28,000,000 a-year should be applied to pay the interest and a portion of the principal of the Debt. The balance applicable towards the extinction of the National Debt under the scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would increase from £200,000 per annum next year to £960,000 in 1884-5, and that would be supplemented by such surpluses as might remain in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer from time to time. That the present taxation was borne without effort and without difficulty by the country was evidenced by the continued prosperity of the Revenue, which almost every year exceeded the calculations of the different Chancellors of the Exchequer, and therefore he trusted that the country would continue to bear without murmur the small charge which it was proposed to appropriate to the sinking fund for the extinction of the National Debt. He was not quite sure that the Committee thoroughly understood the propositions of his right hon. Friend with regard to any future loans for fortifications or local barracks. It was proposed that for the future, if it were necessary to borrow money for such purposes, no sums which remained in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be taken, but that they should go in reduction of the National Debt, while a fresh loan should be opened for the fortification and barrack account. The accounts for the Savings Banks were to be made up to the 31st of December, instead of the 20th of November, the date at which the old Savings Banks accounts were made up; but such accounts were to be laid before Parliament within four months. Under these circumstances, the deficiency of the year would be included in the Estimate of the following year; and he did not think that was an unsatisfactory or an improper arrangement under all the circumstances of the case. Objection had been taken to the Government proposal with regard to the old Savings Banks; but it must be recollected that the acceptance of that proposal would not involve any change whatever in the liabilities of the country towards the trustees of such Savings Banks. On the whole, he would claim for the Bill the virtues of simplicity and security, and for the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer the advantages of simplicity and clearness; and he believed that those virtues and advantages would recommend both the Bill and the statement to the good sense of the House and of the country.

MR. WHALLEY thanked the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer for his Budget, and for the declaration that the National Debt was to be reduced, although they might differ as to the mode in which that object was accomplished. He agreed with the hon. Member for Wick (Mr. Laing) that it would have been good policy to have retained the income-tax at 3*d.* in the pound; but he would entirely do away with Schedule D, and compensate the Revenue for the loss by an addition to the property tax. There was a special grievance under the operation of the income tax in the case of hardworking men whose income was brought, by dint of extra earnings and over work, just a little over £100, and who thereby came outside the line of exemption. He entirely objected against any portion of the Imperial Revenue being applied in aid of local taxation.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE said, he was sorry to find there had been a petty and a Party attempt made to trip up the Chancellor of the Exchequer in many of the subjects he had brought before the attention of the House. He could not help feeling amused when he heard the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lowe), the concoctor of the Bryant and May Budget say that now there was a deficit because they had got a Conservative Chancellor of the Exchequer; but he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Whigs never had a surplus from 1832 until they succeeded in stealing from the Conservatives the services of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich.

MR. GLADSTONE reminded the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he had not stated what amount he was likely to require for the purpose of loans, and how much was represented for that purpose by the £70,000? He would also ask his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) to state what course he proposed to take with his Resolution with regard to Brewers' Licences?

MR. J. HOLMS said, it would be impossible at that late hour—past 12 o'clock—to go on with his Motion, and therefore he would propose that the Chairman now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Holms.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not expect the hon. Gentleman to proceed with his Resolution at that hour if he did not desire to do so. He would therefore suggest that the hon. Gentleman should bring forward his Motion, either on the Report of that Resolution or in Committee on the Bill. It was undesirable that the Government should lose a stage in their proceedings, as their measures had already been somewhat kept back, and they were now approaching the Whitsuntide holidays. Sometime had elapsed since the close of the financial year and the legal expiration of the income tax. The income tax Resolution had, indeed, been reported to the House, and the Board of Inland Revenue collected the tax under it; but it was not convenient that it should continue to be collected for an indefinite time without the sanction of an Act of Parliament. As to the Question put by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, he was not at present in a position to say how much they were likely to raise this year for local loans, because it depended on the amount of the demands made by the Bodies which had the right to borrow, and especially on the amount that might be required under the Education Act for school-houses. But he expected it would not be more than £2,000,000, and therefore he took about £70,000, the sum which would probably cover the interest on that amount.

MR. GLADSTONE suggested to the hon. Member for Hackney that his Resolution should be postponed until after the Whitsuntide holidays, in order that the preliminary stages of the financial measure might be advanced.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that the distinct understanding was, that his hon. Friend the Member for Hackney should not be prejudiced by the passing of the Resolution that evening.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that was the distinct understanding, and in order to comply with it he would suggest that the best time to bring forward the Motion would be on the Motion to go into Committee on the Customs and Inland Revenue Bill.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Where the annual salary, fees, or emoluments appertaining to the office or employment, or payable by virtue of the Commission or Deputation do not exceed one hundred pounds, the Duty of 0 5 0

And where such annual salary, fees, or emoluments exceed one hundred pounds—

For every one hundred pounds, and also for any fractional part of one hundred pounds of such annual salary, fees, or emoluments, the Duty of 0 5 0

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That, in lieu of the Duties of Excise now payable by Law upon or in respect of the Licences to be taken out yearly in any part of Great Britain by the Owners, Proprietors, Makers, and Compounders of, and Persons uttering, vending, or exposing to sale, or keeping ready for sale any Medicine liable to Stamp Duty, there shall be paid for each such Licence, the Duty of 0 5 0”

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

3. Inland Revenue.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Laws relating to the Inland Revenue.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY, in rising to move a Resolution on the subject of Gun Licences, said, that, when last Session he submitted a Motion for the total abolition of the Gun Tax, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that he was not aware there was any feeling in the country in favour of its abolition. He had had many deputations craving abolition of various taxes, but none on the Gun Tax. This Session, however, a deputation of Scotch Members, sufficient to show a strong feeling in Scotland on the subject—and he believed the feeling was as strong in England—waited on the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and explained their views regarding the taxes on guns and dogs. It was accordingly expected that the just interests of the farmers would be considered in the right hon. Gentleman's Budget, both as regarded dogs and guns. As, however, the right hon. Gentleman had failed to make any concession, he (Mr. Barclay) felt it his duty to take the sense of the House on the exemption from duty of guns exclusively used for protecting crops by farmers, market-gardeners, or nurserymen. No one would deny the justice of the Motion he had to submit—namely—

But it was contended that exemptions were inconvenient and very detrimental to the productiveness of a tax. Had the tax been imposed for fiscal purposes, he would admit the force of the objection; but the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of London (Mr. Lowe)—at whose instance the tax was imposed, at a time when there was a large surplus Budget—described it as a tax to restrain lawless habits. The right hon. Gentleman expatiated on the enormity of boys shooting birds, because that led up to poaching, and poaching to crime and Botany Bay; but, whatever might be thought of that kind of argument, the protection of crops by farmers or farmers' servants, could not be described as lawless habits, and was no argument in favour of charging them for gun licences. It would be quite competent, after the proposed exemption was made, for the Excise to prosecute persons of lawless habits using guns without a licence. If they took a licence, the object of the Bill would be defeated which exposed its absurdity. At present, the tax was chiefly paid by farmers for their servants. If the House refused the exemption, it showed that landlords had no confidence in farmers or their servants, and that the Gun Tax was, as it had often been alleged to be, a game law. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution.

Gun Licences.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“ That it is expedient that guns used by farmers or persons employed by them exclusively for the protection of crops be exempted from Licence Duty.”—(Mr. James Barclay.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, this was a matter on which there was no substantial grievance. It was scarcely to be supposed that any farmer did not take out a gun licence; and the regulations of the Board of Inland Revenue were such as to permit the gun which belonged to the master to be used by any person in his employ on his land for the purpose of scaring birds.

Question put.

TEINDS (SCOTLAND) BILL. (No. 67.)
(The Earl of Minto.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF MINTO, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that a measure of this kind was very much wanted in Scotland where much excitement existed as to the mode in which the augmentations of teinds were made; and the object of the present Bill was to simplify and render intelligible the system of teinds in the computation of the value of the stipends. Now, that might seem a very easy matter; but in fact the whole system of calculation was based upon an obsolete and dead language, and the result was that the whole procedure was involved in complexity and obscurity. The object of the Bill therefore was that the teinds which were granted in future should be granted in money instead of being calculated in kind; and it enacted that from and after the passing of the Act teinds and all claims exigible therefrom, or connected therewith, including stipends to the clergy of the Church of Scotland, so far as they have been valued in grain, should be converted into money on an average of the fiars prices for the seven years immediately preceding 1875, and that all future augmentations of stipends should be paid in money. The question of teinds was first settled in Scotland in 1833, when it was arranged that they should be paid in kind, and calculated upon one-tenth of what the land would produce; but however suitable that system might be at the time it was introduced, it was by no means suitable to the present time, and in 1808 an Act was passed legalizing the system now in existence. The Bill proposed to settle the calculations upon a fixed basis—namely, the average receipts of the seven years preceding the year 1875.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Earl of Minto.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR hoped that the noble Earl would not persevere with his Motion, because, if he did, he must offer to their Lordships a little more explanation than his noble Friend had given, and he thought that, after the explanation, their Lordships would not be disposed to assent to the second reading. He must, in the first place, remind their Lordships that his noble Friend the Lord President had stated a few nights since to their Lordships, that the subject was under consideration, and that he hoped in the next Session the Government might be able to propose some measure which would be connected with the procedure in cases of that description. There could be no doubt that, as the noble Earl had stated, the present mode of procedure in calculating ministers' stipends was involved in complexity and expense; but the noble Earl's Bill had not the slightest reference either to the expenses or to the complexities of that procedure. It was a Bill not connected with procedure at all, but a Bill connected entirely with the mode of averaging; and which affected property in a way which measures which were introduced in their Lordships' House were not in the habit of doing. In the year 1808 the Act of Parliament was passed which created a sort of code under which stipends should be augmented. Up to that time they had been dealt with exactly as the noble Earl wished them to be dealt with—namely, by a payment of money out of the teinds where there were any. But the Act of 1808 followed the principle on which they were dealt with by the great Lord Burleigh in the reign of Queen Elizabeth—namely, that the augmentation of stipends should depend, not upon any money payment, but upon the value of grain, in order that ministers might have the benefit of any increase in the price of that article, so as to increase their income. It was remarkable that after that Act had passed, and when prices were very high, the ministers came forward and applied to Parliament to do what the noble Earl was now doing—namely, to fix for the future the augmentation of stipend on an average of the prices for seven years previous—they wanted to have the benefit of prices when they were high. But the measure which was then asked for was very properly refused by Parliament. Now, it was a little remarkable that this Bill should be introduced at a time when prices were very low, and, therefore, would operate to prevent any increase in the value of stipends arising from an increase in the price of grain—to the great benefit of proprietors. He wished, however, to show their Lordships how this measure would work. They were not aware that teinds in Scotland were a different kind of property from tithes in England. They were held sometimes by owners of land and sometimes by what were called "titulars" of the ground; the minister was never entitled, as in England, to the actual tithe, but only to a stipend arising out of the tithe; and if that stipend became insufficient from any reason, then they had a right to have it augmented and modified if the tithe were unexhausted. Now, their Lordships would observe in what position the minister was. He was a stipendiary and an incumbrance on the teind, and entitled to payment of an annual sum out of the teind. The payment by the price of grain was not a payment of so much money; but a payment in money which was fixed on an equivalent for the quantity of grain and victuals which he was entitled to demand. That being the present position of the minister, he thought it would be most unjust that they should take advantage of the price of grain being low at the present time, to calculate the amount the minister was entitled to receive on an average of seven years. It might be that the measure would operate very disadvantageously to the minister, and, at all events, he had a right to be heard upon it. What right had the noble Earl to say to the ministers that the amount of their stipend should only be calculated on a certain quantity of grain or victual for an average of seven years, and to that amount they should be fixed for all time? Was ever such a measure proposed to Parliament? Yet that was what the Bill did. Supposing that in the time of Charles II., the ministers' stipends had been fixed at the then price of money, and had never since been changed, what would the value be now as compared with the value of money, and where would the ministers be and what would be their salaries at the present day? It could not be right, without giving notice to the country at large and without giving those who were most interested notice of the change which was to be made, to pass a Bill affecting the stipends of the ministers. On these grounds he did not think their Lordships would assent to the measure.

THE EARL OF MINTO said, that that was the first time he had heard any objection raised to the Bill, and he thought it would have been well if the noble and learned Lord had raised some of the objections when he first brought forward the subject; because he certainly had not understood, from the reply he had received from the noble Duke, that the subject was under the consideration of the Government. He was gratified by the trouble the noble and learned Lord had evidently taken in reference to the application of the seven years average. As the second reading was opposed by the Government, he would prefer to withdraw the Bill.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that this question of augmentation of stipends was first mentioned a fortnight ago, and the Lord President said that he was about to consult the Lord Advocate on the subject, and he was glad to hear that the Government proposed to deal with it. The Bill, however, of his noble Friend referred to a totally different matter. It removed none of the evils connected with the present system of augmentation, but preserved all the personal interests. He agreed with the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack that this was a Bill which would hardly be received by their Lordships.

Motion and Bill (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

ACCIDENTS ON RAILWAYS, 1874.

RETURN. QUESTION.

LORD COTTESLOE rose to call attention to the delay which took place in the preparation of the Returns of Railway Accidents required by the 34 & 35 Vict. c. 78. He did not intend, on the present occasion, to discuss the question of railway accidents. In regard of the prevention of such accidents he believed Railway Companies would be more influenced by publicity and public opinion than by any Acts of Parliament. Various enactments had been passed with the view of enforcing on Railway Companies their obligations towards the public. By the 34 & 35 Vict. certain Returns of accidents were required to be made by the Companies; but there had been great delay in the presentation of these Returns. His purpose in now drawing attention to this state of things was to induce the Government to enforce on the Companies the due performance of their statutory obligations.

THE EARL OF DUNMORE said, that the Question which had been put to him by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Cottesloe) had already been answered, inasmuch as the Returns to which he had made reference had been already presented to Parliament, together with similar Returns for the first three months of the present year. But he must point out the annual Return of railway accidents had been laid before Parliament this year at a much earlier date than in any previous year since the Regulation of Railways Act of 1871 came into operation; and by the arrangement which had recently been made for laying these Returns before Parliament every three months, all information, with the most minute details regarding railway accidents and the causes that led to them, would be in possession of Parliament and the public within a very short time after the expiration of each succeeding quarter. With regard to the Returns for the first three months of the present year, there had been more delay than would occur in future, owing to the form of the new Returns differing materially from those printed before, which had necessitated the setting up of new type. But now that the new form had been set up the printers stated that they would be able to print off the Returns in a very few days. It might be well for him to state to the House that the greater portion of the general Report upon railway accidents which was prepared every year by Captain Tyler was already in the printer's hands, and he thought that, in all probability, he would be in a position to lay that Report upon the Table of their Lordship's House within a month from the present date. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Cottesloe) had called attention to the great delay which occurred; but it must be borne in mind that the information obtained from the Railway Companies with regard to accidents since the passing of the Regulation of Railways Act, 1871, had very largely increased. The Return of railway accidents for the year 1870 consisted of only 24 pages, and was not presented till the 6th of March 1871, whereas the Return of 1874 consisted of 287 pages, and had been presented to Parliament on the 5th instant. In the preparation of this Return the very greatest accuracy was required, and owing to the enormous mass of manuscript forms which the Board of Trade received, the work was exceedingly heavy. This Return for 1874 was not only larger in bulk than the one for 1870, but several analytical Tables had been added to it demanding much care and time for their preparation. This greatly enhanced the value of the Return. The Return of 1870 was simply a bare record of facts, with only two summaries attached to it; whereas the present Return gave as fully as possible the causes of all train accidents and all details relative to axles, tyres, rails, and rolling-stock generally. In the Return for 1870 there were only 115 servants returned as having been killed, and 129 as having been injured, of whom no classification was made; whereas in 1874 there were 788 returned as killed and 2,815 as injured; and, as would be seen on reference to the Tables, these accidents were divided into 20 classes, which showed the nature of the occupation in which each person was engaged when he met with the accident. In the same way the accidents to trains and passengers were subjected to detailed analysis. In addition to all that, a considerable time was necessarily taken up by printing this Return. There was, he thought, no reason for stating that as a general rule the Railway Companies did not send in the information required by the Regulation Act without unnecessary delay, and this remark applied particularly to the large Companies. It would not be practicable for a large Company like the Great Northern, the Midland, or the London and North-Western, to send in the Return of an accident which happened at the furthest point of their system by the next day, as the Return of such an accident had to be forwarded by the officer of the Company on the spot where it happened to the head offices of the Company, wherever they might be situated, entered in the books at those offices, and then sent to the Board of Trade from the chief office. There was, he also thought, every disposition on the part of the Companies to cheerfully afford all the particulars and details that were required of them. By the arrangement proposed for publishing the Returns of these accidents quarterly instead of annually, and by strengthening in some way the department charged with the collection of these statistics, he believed there would in future be no cause for any delay.

LORD HOUGHTON thanked the noble Earl (the Earl of Dunmore) for the testimony he had borne to the willingness of Railway Companies to make the Returns, and to do so without unnecessary delay. He believed the Railway Companies were desirous of complying in every particular with the requirements of the Act.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM thought that the Returns were considerably swollen by accidents which were not intended to come within the category contained in the 5th clause of the Act. The clause required that the Returns should be of accidents which occurred in or about the working of railways or in buildings connected with them, or attributable to any mischance in the course of working them, but the Returns included many accidents which could not in strictness be said to be connected with railways. For instance, the horses employed by the Railway Companies, like some horses otherwise employed, were disposed to be vicious and to kick those who groomed them. Surely kicks inflicted by horses in the stables of Railway Companies were not intended to come with the category of the 5th clause; but they were returned by some Companies. So were accidents which had occurred to boys while sliding down the handrails of railway bridges, and to stokers who had fallen down the ladders of stokeholes, and accidents which had been caused by railway waggons coming in contact with railway posts, though those waggons were not driven by servants of the Companies; accidents occurring to persons working in the workshops and warehouses of the Companies. Among the accidents returned as railway accidents was one caused to a lady by putting her foot through a hole in her dress while walking under a railway bridge. He thought the Board of Trade might interfere in the matter so as to limit the Returns to accidents within the purview of the Act.

LORD CARLINGFORD, as being the official author of the Act of 1871, well remembered the difficulty which had been experienced in defining the accidents which should come within Clause 5. The object was to include enough, and not to bring in too much.

He did not say the wording of the clause had been quite successful; but, on the other hand, he did not understand the noble Duke (the Duke of Buckingham) to propose that it should be changed. He concurred with the noble Duke in thinking that some of the accidents included in the Returns were not such as it had been intended to bring within the Act, and he thought the Board of Trade would exercise a wise discretion in omitting such cases from the public Returns. However, he deprecated any alteration in the wording of the Act.

THE EARL OF DUNMORE said, that the Board of Trade had already exercised its discretion in expunging ridiculous Returns, and the matter referred to by the noble Duke was at this moment receiving the attention of the Department.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS (ENGLAND)
BILL.—(Nos. 39-63.)
(The Lord President.)

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

THE MARQUESS OF BRISTOL proposed to insert in the title after "Agricultural," the words "and Pastoral."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND thought this change would make the title unnecessarily long without producing any effect upon the enacting clauses.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Clause 2 (Commencement of Act).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND proposed to alter the date for the operation of the Act from the 31st December 1875 to the 14th of January, 1876.

Amendment moved to leave out after ("the") to the end of the clause, and insert ("fourteenth day of January one thousand eight hundred and seventy six.")—(The Lord President.)

VISCOUNT PORTMAN desired to give landlords and tenants, where the term commenced at Candlemas, a little longer time to consider whether they would come under the Act, and he proposed to substitute the 14th of February.

After short conversation, the LORD PRESIDENT'S Amendment withdrawn.

Then Amendment of VISCOUNT PORTMAN agreed to.

Clause amended and agreed to.

Clause 4 (Interpretation Clause).

LORD PENZANCE moved to add to the Interpretation Clause the following definition:—

“‘The letting value’ means the value at which a holding could be or could have been let if the improvement had not been executed.”

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he would like the Government to consider what would be the effect of a stringent application of the words in this clause on a tenant's claim for compensation. A tenant might have improved by drainage or lime, and yet it might be very doubtful if he would be able to prove to the satisfaction of a Court of Justice that he had made the farm as a whole more valuable to the landlord in the matter of rent. The improvements effected might be very proper ones for his own occupation or that of the landlord; but to make it imperative on the tenant to prove that the letting value of the farm was increased would be imposing on him too heavy a burden. In the Irish Land Act which dealt with much larger matters than this Bill, the terms used were “any work which being executed added to the letting value of the holding,” and in reference to tillages and manures the words were, “or other works the benefit of which was unexhausted at the time of quitting the holding.” He believed that the latter was the true test in the case of minor improvements.

LORD HAMPTON thought the objection which had just been stated deserved serious consideration. He was bound to say he regretted that his noble Friend the President of the Council had persevered in making the “increased letting value” of the land in consequence of the tenant's improvements, the test or measure of compensation. Now, this had been described by his noble Friend himself as the very principle of the measure. With regard to permanent improvements of an important character, he quite admitted that the letting value was an unobjectionable test; but when they applied that test to those minor improvements to which it would be applied, he looked with alarm to the encouragement it would give to litigation of the most unsatisfactory kind. He was fortified in that statement by what he found to be the opinion of practical men out-of-doors. Last week at a meeting of the Central Chamber of Agriculture in London, this point was discussed, and resolutions were passed condemning the proposal by a majority of four to one.

LORD EGERTON said, that it would be extremely difficult to know what would be the “letting value” of a farm at the end of 10 or 14 years. Everyone who had sat on Assessment Committees must know the difficulty of ascertaining the value of farms; and he feared the clause would lead to a great deal of litigation. He entered his protest against the principle of the Bill with reference to this point.

LORD DYNEVOR said, he quite agreed with the three noble Lords who had addressed the House as to the difficulties likely to arise from the present definition. He thought the words “letting value” would defeat the object the Government had in view. He thought there should be no compensation unless the whole holding was increased in value.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE must remind noble Lords that they were not now discussing the principle of the clause which had been decided in Committee—the question before the House was the Amendment, which was a question of definition only. The grievance of tenant-farmers was that while they laid out their capital in improvements on the land, at the end of their lease the farm was either let to another tenant at a higher rent, or the rent was raised on the former tenant, and the difference went into the pocket of the landlord.

THE EARL OF MORLEY opposed the Amendment. Clause 5 contemplated that the improvement should be so effectual as to add to the “letting value” of the land before he should be entitled to claim compensation. This was intelligible, and as a definition of the improvement there was some value in the words. But Clause 7, making the addition to the letting value the basis for estimating the compensation, threw the whole matter into confusion, and would be difficult in practice. Suppose the landlord let his land upon conditions that the tenant should make certain improvements—or in other words borrowed his tenant's capital for improving his own property—was it right that at the end of the term the tenant should lose the capital expended, if the improvements, however, efficiently done, did not add to the actual “letting value" of the land? Or supposing the improvements were not efficiently done, was it right that the tenant should lose his whole outlay? Those remarks applied to the first class of improvements, for which the consent of the landlord was required. And that consent, to which any conditions might be attached, rendered the landlord a party to the transaction. But as to less durable improvements, when their Lordships considered all the different circumstances which might affect the letting value of a farm—competition among tenants, alterations in the neighbourhood, and various other things—they would see that it would be extremely difficult to say whether this or that particular improvement had added so much to the "letting value." Suppose, again, the particular improvements sanctioned by the landlord proved to be injudicious, and did not improve the value of the land, was it just that the whole loss should be borne by the tenant and none by the landlord? It would be much fairer to assess compensation according to the outlay than according to the unexhausted addition to the letting value.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he could not share in the views expressed by his noble Friends as to the possible operation of the Bill. As to what had fallen from his noble Friend (Lord Hampton), if he thought that the effect of this Bill would be to increase litigation, he should regret very much that he had any share in introducing it. But he could not think that that would be the effect of the Bill. The noble Earl who had last spoken (the Earl of Morley) thought the best way of dealing with this question would be by taking the outlay into consideration as the basis of compensation. But if compensation was to be assessed according to the outlay of the tenant, it would lead to an amount of litigation far in excess of what his noble Friend (Lord Hampton) anticipated. The noble Earl thought it would be very unfair that the tenant should not be recouped, if he did not execute the improvements in an efficient manner. But surely the tenant had no right to expect compensation unless the improvements were properly made. The first thing a landlord would have to do would be to see whether the improvements were real and efficient improvements, for, in fact, what the tenant had done might be the reverse of an improvement. He must demur in the strongest way to the assumption of the noble Lord (Lord Carlingford) that there was no other source from which the Government could derive the definition of "letting value" than the Irish Land Act. It would not require a great amount of ingenuity to discover those terms without going over the water to get them. He was never enamoured of the Irish Land Act, and certainly would never have gone to that Act as the groundwork of this Bill. Nor would he wish to lead the country to think that what was good for Ireland was good for England. But if such improvements were effected as would make the farm better, what surer proof of that could there be than that the farm should command a higher price in the market? and what was that but adding to its letting value?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY thought there was great force in the objection to the words "letting value," which he believed would introduce an element of difficulty into the question: nor did he see why their Lordships should object to borrow words from the Irish Land Act. It should be remembered that in many cases the compensation to be received would be a very small sum; and that being so he could not conceive a more difficult task to impose on the arbitrator than to call upon him to say whether the improvement had added to the "letting value."

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, if £100 had been laid out by a tenant—say, on bones—leaving two years of unexhausted improvement for which the landlord ought to pay, the tenant would find a difficulty in proving that the land would let for more rent in consequence of what he had done. Land was let for long periods, and might not let for more on account of improvements which would die out in two or three years.

THE EARL OF DERBY said the logical consequence of this argument was that a farm in bad order would let for as much as a farm in good order.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND did not believe that the principle of letting value was really applicable here.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that when they spoke of benefit resulting to the land from "unexhausted improvements" they could mean nothing but that the letting value of the land was thereby increased. In other words, if a farm was in an exhausted condition, the rent would be less; if it were in an improved condition, the rent would be more.

Amendment agreed to, on the understanding that it should be printed in the Bill, with a view to further consideration at the next stage.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Tenant's title to compensation).

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that as the clause stood, the assertion of tenant-right was too broad and without sufficient limitation. On the last occasion when the Bill was under consideration the Government agreed to introduce the words "subject to the provisions of this Act;" but he thought these words did not sufficiently point out the limitations. In order that the public might see at once not only the equity of the claim for compensation, but also the equity of the general limitations, he would move the omission of Clause 5, in order to insert the following:—

"Where a tenant, except in pursuance of an agreement for valuable consideration, executes on his holding an improvement adding to the letting value thereof, he shall be entitled to obtain, on the determination of the tenancy, compensation in respect of the improvement."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR pointed out that subsequent clauses in the Bill provided all the limitations desired by the noble Duke.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Clause 6 (Description and three Classes of Improvements).

On the Motion of the Duke of RICHMOND, the words "or of works for supply of water for agricultural or domestic purposes" were inserted.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY (for the Duke of WESTMINSTER) moved to insert in the First Class ("Eradication of Fences.")

LORD REDESDALE said, he did not think this was a case for compensation, especially as the tenant would have the old fences.

LORD HENNIKER thought the Amendment unnecessary, agreeing with his noble Friend at the Table, for he was constantly asked by his tenants to allow them to take down fences; they were only too ready to do so for the benefit it gave them, and the difficulty was rather to prevent their taking down fences which were necessary for the proper drainage of the farm. It would be extremely inconvenient, too, to have the putting up of new fences, and the eradication of fences in the same class of improvements.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE did not at all agree that the old fences would sufficiently compensate the farmer.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that what suited one part of the country would be unsuitable to another. In Devonshire the fences were wide banks, which could not be removed without considerable cost, and the work would be a permanent improvement.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND could not assent to the proposal of his noble Friend.

After a few words from Earl GRANVILLE,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, one of the chief merits of this Bill was that, without the consent of the remainderman being asked or required, it allowed, it might be, a limited owner to exercise the powers which it gave and thereby to create a charge upon the inheritance. He had frequently maintained that that was a right principle. He believed this was the first time that that step—a very large step—was taken. But in giving to limited owners the power to consent to these improvements, and thereby to make a charge on the inheritance, it ought to be made very clear that the matters in respect of which limited owners were to give their consent were beyond dispute substantial improvements: and he doubted whether the "eradication of fences" could in general be classed among such improvements.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

LORD HENNIKER moved, in Third Class, to leave out from ("Consumption") to end of clause, and insert—

"1. Consumption on the farm by cattle, sheep, or pigs, of cake.

"2. Consumption on the farm of purchased corn or other feeding stuff not the product of the farm or district."

The noble Lord said, his object was to put cake and other feeding stuffs in an entirely different category. Cake was of undoubted manurial value, but corn was not so. Linseed cake and corn, for instance, cost nearly the same price per ton; but linseed cake, and other kinds of cake, too, was of seven times greater manurial value than corn. Again, corn was a good thing for producing meat, and the farmer was amply repaid, by the sale of his fat stock, for the use of it, in most cases. It was of great importance that corn used should not be the product of the farm or neighbourhood, so that there should be no opening for fraud. Some foreign corn might be of manurial value, but corn grown on a farm, except beans, was practically of little, if of any value in that respect. This ought to be distinctly laid down in the clause.

After short discussion,

On Question, resolved in the negative.

Amendment made, by omitting the word "corn" from the articles of consumption not produced on the holding.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14 agreed to, with verbal Amendments.

Clause 15 (Amount of landlord's compensation) struck out.

Clause 16 (Notice of intended claim).

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND moved the insertion of words enabling a landlord to give a counter notice to his tenant of his intention to claim compensation. This would only be necessary in case the tenant gave notice of a claim. Where no such notice was given, the landlord would have his remedy in the usual way through the Courts of Law.

Moved, at end of clause, insert as new paragraphs—

"Where a tenant gives such a notice the landlord may, before the determination of the tenancy, or within fourteen days thereafter, give a counter-notice in writing to the tenant of his intention to make a claim for compensation under this Act.

"Every such notice and counter-notice shall state, as far as reasonably may be, the particulars of the intended claim."—(The Duke of Richmond.)

Amendment agreed to; Words added.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that no consideration had as yet been given to a numerous class—namely, mortgagees, who, having lent money on the security of holdings, might be damaged by the arrangements which the Bill facilitated. He wished to know if the charge on the holding allowed by the Bill would be a first charge, or whether it would rank after charges already existing?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the noble Earl's sympathy with mortgagees was thrown away. They would not be in the slightest degree injured.

Clauses 17 to 33, inclusive, agreed to, with Amendments.

New clauses inserted after Clause 33.

Clause A. (Power for landlord to obtain charge for tenant in certain cases.)

Clause B. (Duration of charge.)

Clause C. (Application of Act to Crown Lands.)

Clause D. (Application of Act to land of Duchy of Cornwall.)

Clause E. (Application of Act to land of Duchy of Lancaster.)

Clause F. (Provision where landlord incumbent of benefice.)

Clauses 34, 35, and 36 agreed to.

Clause 37 (No restriction on contract).

Clause 38 (Application of Act as regards general tenancies).

THE MARQUESS OF HUNTLY moved to leave out the clauses, and insert the following:—

"Nothing in this Act shall prevent a landlord and tenant, or intending landlord and tenant, from entering into and carrying into effect by any contract in writing any such agreement as they think fit, nor interfere with the operation of any such contract.

"This Act in the case of all contracts of tenancy taking effect after the commencement of this Act shall have full operation in respect of all matters for which this Act makes provision, except such of the same matters as shall by a contract in writing between a landlord and tenant or intending landlord and tenant be specifically excepted from its operation.

"A contract of tenancy from year to year current at the commencement of this Act shall be deemed to be a contract of tenancy within the meaning of this section, but only from and after the end of the first year of tenancy begun and completed after the commencement of this Act.

"Except as in this section mentioned this Act shall not apply to any contract of tenancy current at the commencement of this Act."

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the Amendment was unnecessary; Clause 37 simply said that the landlord and tenant might enter into an agreement, and Clause 38 said how they might do it.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, it appeared to him that, as the Bill was drawn, a tenant would be precluded from offering compensation unless he conformed in all respects to the provisions of the Bill, and if an owner made an agreement with a tenant involving slight differences, such departure from the provisions of the Bill would involve the forfeiture of all claims under it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, there was nothing in the Bill which laid down a cut and dry agreement which a limited owner might make with a tenant; but it gave certain limits within which he might make any agreement he pleased with his tenants.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Bill to be read 3^a on Thursday next; and to be printed, as amended. (No. 98.)

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF COAL-MINERS.—QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked Mr. Attorney General, If he has taken steps to ascertain the correctness of the reports given in "The Times" of the 29th April and 1st May, of two meetings held at Leeds on the 28th and 29th April, composed of delegates from coal miners of the United Kingdom, by which reports it appears that a "National Federation" (to be organized by a Committee of nine elected by such meeting of delegates) is to be established; and by which reports it further appears that some of the delegates present at the meetings proposed that, failing other measures bearing upon the question of wages, a simultaneous and general cessation of labour in all the collieries in the Kingdom should be brought about; and, assuming that any such simultaneous and general cessation be an object of the proposed federation, whether that federation would not become, under the existing law, an illegal combination, rendering its promoters liable to penal consequences?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Sir, my hon. Friend was good enough to give me previous Notice of the Question which he a few days ago placed upon the Paper, and which he has just read, and at the same time to supply me with copies of the reports given in The Times of the two meetings held at Leeds on the 28th and 29th of April; and, for the purpose of replying to the Question of my hon. Friend, I shall assume that such reports are correct. It would appear from such reports, that the persons present at the meetings referred to, and who are described as delegates of the National Association and of the Amalgamated Society of Miners, as well as of some independent bodies of workmen, passed a resolution to the effect that the establishment of a national union or confederation was highly desirable, and that a committee of nine members of the conference was appointed to draw up a code of rules for the government of the federation. It also appears that in the course of the discussion which preceded the passing of the resolution, one of the delegates present suggested that, if things could not be otherwise righted, all the miners in Great Britain should give up working simultaneously for a prescribed period, and that such views were supported by two others of the delegates present. When, however, this suggestion was made, the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Macdonald), who was in the Chair, observed that a general cessation of labour would be inflicting unmerited wrong on an innocent third party—namely, society at large. Those remarks appear from the reports to have been well received by the meeting, and the name of the hon. Member stands first upon the list of the committee who were appointed, whilst neither of the delegates who advocated cessation of labour was placed upon it. Having thus replied to the first part of the Question of my hon. Friend, I trust that the House will agree with me in the opinion, that it would not be consistent with my duty as a Law Officer of the Crown to make any definite reply to its second part, which, from the form in which it is expressed, evidently assumes that, in the opinion of my hon. Friend, the proposed federation may become an illegal combination, and inquiries of me whether its promoters would not become liable to penal consequences in a certain hypothetical event, the circumstances of which it is impossible to predicate, even if the probability of its happening could be reasonably assumed.

THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH—COLLEGES OF MINOR CANONS.

QUESTION.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he intends to bring in a Bill to regulate Colleges of Minor Canons, Lay Vicars, and similar subordinate Corporations in Cathedral Foundations; and, whether, where the numbers in such Corporations have fallen below the minimum prescribed by statute or charter, there is any power to compel Deans and Chapters to fill up the vacancies?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, it was not the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill, at all events during the present Session, to effect the purpose mentioned in the Question of the hon. Member. In 1840 a Bill was brought in upon the subject, and in consequence of a particular clause having been struck out of it in "another place" it had rather complicated the difficulty.

He agreed, however, with his hon. Friend that it was desirable something should be done to remedy the existing state of things. With regard to the filling up of vacancies where the numbers in a particular corporation had fallen below the minimum prescribed by statute or charter, he was advised that a mandamus would lie to compel the Dean and Chapter to perform their duty with respect to the minor canons; but, as the issuing of a mandamus was a matter of discretion in regard to which the Court would take all the circumstances into account, he could not give any opinion as to the manner in which such discretion would be exercised.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE gave Notice that on an early day he would call attention to the subject of Cathedral establishments, and to the recommendations of the Royal Commission thereon.

THE LOCK-OUT IN SOUTH WALES.

QUESTION.

MR. MACDONALD asked Mr. Attorney General, If his attention has been directed to the recent lock-out in South Wales, which lasted for over twelve weeks; whether he is aware that such lock-out was organized, maintained, and carried on by a combination known as the South Wales Mine Owners' Association, or by some such name, which for the most part holds private meetings in Cardiff; whether this combination is an illegal combination; and, whether, in the event of his considering it an illegal combination, the Government will direct a prosecution or inflict the penal consequences which follow upon illegal combinations?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: In answer, Sir, to the first and second parts of the Question of the hon. Member for Stafford, I have to state that, to the extent of the information which I have derived from reading the public journals, my attention has been directed to the recent lock-out in South Wales; but I am not aware that such lock-out was organized, maintained, and carried on by a combination known as the South Wales Mine Owners' Association, or by some such name, which for the most part holds private meetings in Cardiff. Under these circumstances, it becomes unnecessary for me to answer the third and fourth parts of the same Question of the hon. Member, as they are based upon an assumed state of facts, of the existence of which I am ignorant.

IRELAND—STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES, BELFAST.

QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he has been informed that the attorneys practising as advocates in Belfast have lately held a meeting, and forwarded a Memorial to the Lord Lieutenant describing the present stipendiary system in that town as intolerable, and praying for the immediate appointment of two barristers as stipendiary magistrates; and, whether he is aware that for upwards of forty years no barrister or attorney has acted as stipendiary magistrate in Belfast?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I have no information that will enable me to reply to the first part of the hon. Member's Question. With regard to its second part, a Memorial has been forwarded to the Lord Lieutenant complaining of the way in which petty sessions business is transacted at Belfast, and asking for the appointment of a barrister as stipendiary magistrate. Inquiry is being made into the facts alleged in that Memorial; but I am bound to say I have heard no other complaints as to the manner in which business is done by the two stipendiary magistrates who act at Belfast.

THE MAGISTRACY—APPOINTMENT OF MAGISTRATES, EXETER.

QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is proposed to add to the number of magistrates for the city of Exeter; and, whether a list of ten gentlemen, all Conservatives, has been sent up to the Lord Chancellor for him to select from; and whether, of these ten, one is a wine merchant and three others practising solicitors?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, in reply to the Question of the hon. Member, I beg to say that I know nothing as to any proposal to add to the number of magistrates for the City of Exeter. My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor desires me to say that he has not received any application for the appointment of additional magistrates for the City, and I am therefore entirely ignorant whether one aspirant to the office is a wine merchant and three others are practising solicitors.

PUBLIC PROSECUTORS—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. DUNDAS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can inform the House whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any Bill this Session for the appointment of Public Prosecutors in England?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Perhaps, Sir, the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell), who has given Notice of a similar Question, will allow me to answer it at the same time. I have to say, in answer to both Questions, that it is the intention of the Government, before the end of the Session, to move for leave to bring in a Bill for the appointment of a Public Prosecutor.

SOUTH AFRICA—DELAGOA BAY.

QUESTION.

MR. ALEXANDER M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any truth in the statement, made on Portuguese authority, to the effect that the President of the French Republic has decided against the claim of Great Britain to the southern part of Delagoa Bay—whether the ownership of Inyack Island has been kept distinct from the question of sovereignty on the mainland; and, when the Papers on this subject will be laid upon the Table?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that the whole question of the claim of Great Britain to the southern part of Delagoa Bay had been referred to the President of the French Republic for arbitration. The question of the ownership of Inyack Island had been included in that arbitration. It would probably be a month or six weeks before the President of the French Republic delivered his award; but whenever the Government received it, no time would be lost in communicating it to the House.

COPYRIGHT ACTS—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

Mr. EDWARD JENKINS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the fact that an Act passed by the Canadian Legislature to amend the Law of Copyright has been reserved for Her Majesty's consideration, the Government will consent to the immediate appointment of a Select Committee or Royal Commission to inquire into the subject of Copyright and Copyright Legislation?

Mr. DISRAELI: Sir, I received this morning a deputation, of which the hon. Member for Dundee himself was a Member, on the subject of the Copyright Acts, and I stated then that the representations made to me were of a grave character and deserving the consideration of the Government, and that after considering them I should give my decision. The time, however, has hardly been long enough since I received that deputation this morning for me to give that decision.

STRAY DOGS—SHEEP WORRYING.

QUESTION.

Mr. BAILLIE-HAMILTON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been drawn to the annoyance caused to farmers in Scotland by the depredations of stray dogs in the neighbourhood of towns and large villages, and the serious loss frequently entailed by sheep-worrying and disturbance of stock; and, if so, whether he is prepared to take any steps to remedy this grievance?

THE LORD ADVOCATE in reply, said, his attention had been directed to the subject, and he had brought it under the consideration of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who informed him that it was not a question peculiar to Scotland, but that the same thing occurred in England and Ireland. All he (the Lord Advocate) could say was, that the matter should receive the consideration of the Government.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) BILL.

QUESTION.

Mr. KAVANAGH asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the deep interest felt in Ireland on the subject of closing public houses on Sunday, and to the circumstances under which the test of a Division was prevented on Wednesday last, he will afford an opportunity by fixing some day for the resumption of the Debate, of having the Question brought to a direct issue?

Mr. DISRAELI: I am quite of opinion, Sir, with the hon. Member for Carlisle as to the desirability of taking the opinion of the House on the Bill; but I am not at the present moment in a position to fix any day whatever upon which the opinion of the House may be taken. I would venture to suggest that hon. Gentlemen on both sides who take a deep interest in the question should confer together and endeavour to arrive at some satisfactory arrangement.

INDIA—THE GAIKWAR OF BARODA.

QUESTION.

Mr. RICHARD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he will include in the Papers relating to the trial and deposition of the Gaikwar of Baroda any Correspondence relative to the seat or ceremonial question at the Court of Baroda, raised by the Government of Bombay in December 1872; also any Correspondence relative to the marriage of the Gaikwar in May 1874, and to the issue of such marriage; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will consent to postpone its decision on the question of the succession to the Prince until the Papers respecting his deposition have been laid before Parliament?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the Papers which we propose to present to Parliament relating to the proceeding of the Commission appointed to inquire into certain charges made against the Gaikwar and to his deposition are very voluminous, and I do not think any practical object would be attained by increasing their bulk by including correspondence upon so irrelevant a matter as a question of precedence raised in 1872. Papers relating to the Gaikwar's marriage will be laid before Parliament. The decision of Her Majesty's Government upon the question of the succession to the Prince was embodied in the Viceroy's Proclamation of the 22nd of April. It is not the intention of Her Majesty's of the hon. Member, as they are based upon an assumed state of facts, of the existence of which I am ignorant.

IRELAND—STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES, BELFAST.

QUESTION.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he has been informed that the attorneys practising as advocates in Belfast have lately held a meeting, and forwarded a Memorial to the Lord Lieutenant describing the present stipendiary system in that town as intolerable, and praying for the immediate appointment of two barristers as stipendiary magistrates; and, whether he is aware that for upwards of forty years no barrister or attorney has acted as stipendiary magistrate in Belfast?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, I have no information that will enable me to reply to the first part of the hon. Member's Question. With regard to its second part, a Memorial has been forwarded to the Lord Lieutenant complaining of the way in which petty sessions business is transacted at Belfast, and asking for the appointment of a barrister as stipendiary magistrate. Inquiry is being made into the facts alleged in that Memorial; but I am bound to say I have heard no other complaints as to the manner in which business is done by the two stipendiary magistrates who act at Belfast.

THE MAGISTRACY—APPOINTMENT OF MAGISTRATES, EXETER.

QUESTION.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is proposed to add to the number of magistrates for the city of Exeter; and, whether a list of ten gentlemen, all Conservatives, has been sent up to the Lord Chancellor for him to select from; and whether, of these ten, one is a wine merchant and three others practising solicitors?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, in reply to the Question of the hon. Member, I beg to say that I know nothing as to any proposal to add to the number of magistrates for the City of Exeter. My noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor desires me to say that he has not received any application for the appointment of additional magistrates for the City, and I am therefore entirely ignorant whether one aspirant to the office is a wine merchant and three others are practising solicitors.

PUBLIC PROSECUTORS—LEGISLATION.
QUESTION.

MR. DUNDAS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he can inform the House whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce any Bill this Session for the appointment of Public Prosecutors in England?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Perhaps, Sir, the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Whitwell), who has given Notice of a similar Question, will allow me to answer it at the same time. I have to say, in answer to both Questions, that it is the intention of the Government, before the end of the Session, to move for leave to bring in a Bill for the appointment of a Public Prosecutor.

SOUTH AFRICA—DELAGOA BAY.

QUESTION.

MR. ALEXANDER M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any truth in the statement, made on Portuguese authority, to the effect that the President of the French Republic has decided against the claim of Great Britain to the southern part of Delagoa Bay—whether the ownership of Inyack Island has been kept distinct from the question of sovereignty on the mainland; and, when the Papers on this subject will be laid upon the Table?

MR. BOURKE, in reply, said, that the whole question of the claim of Great Britain to the southern part of Delagoa Bay had been referred to the President of the French Republic for arbitration. The question of the ownership of Inyack Island had been included in that arbitration. It would probably be a month or six weeks before the President of the French Republic delivered his award; but whenever the Government received it, no time would be lost in communicating it to the House.

COPYRIGHT ACTS—LEGISLATION.

QUESTION.

MR. EDWARD JENKINS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the fact that an Act passed by the Canadian Legislature to amend the Law of Copyright has been reserved for Her Majesty's consideration, the Government will consent to the immediate appointment of a Select Committee or Royal Commission to inquire into the subject of Copyright and Copyright Legislation?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I received this morning a deputation, of which the hon. Member for Dundee himself was a Member, on the subject of the Copyright Acts, and I stated then that the representations made to me were of a grave character and deserving the consideration of the Government, and that after considering them I should give my decision. The time, however, has hardly been long enough since I received that deputation this morning for me to give that decision.

STRAY DOGS—SHEEP WORRYING.

QUESTION.

MR. BAILLIE-HAMILTON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been drawn to the annoyance caused to farmers in Scotland by the depredations of stray dogs in the neighbourhood of towns and large villages, and the serious loss frequently entailed by sheep-worrying and disturbance of stock; and, if so, whether he is prepared to take any steps to remedy this grievance?

THE LORD ADVOCATE in reply, said, his attention had been directed to the subject, and he had brought it under the consideration of his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, who informed him that it was not a question peculiar to Scotland, but that the same thing occurred in England and Ireland. All he (the Lord Advocate) could say was, that the matter should receive the consideration of the Government.

SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS ON SUNDAY (IRELAND) BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. KAVANAGH asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, having regard to the deep interest felt in Ireland on the subject of closing public houses on Sunday, and to the circumstances under which the test of a Division was prevented on Wednesday last, he will afford an opportunity by fixing some day for the resumption of the Debate, of having the Question brought to a direct issue?

MR. DISRAELI: I am quite of opinion, Sir, with the hon. Member for Carlow as to the desirability of taking the opinion of the House on the Bill; but I am not at the present moment in a position to fix any day whatever upon which the opinion of the House may be taken. I would venture to suggest that hon. Gentlemen on both sides who take a deep interest in the question should confer together and endeavour to arrive at some satisfactory arrangement.

INDIA—THE GAIKWAR OF BARODA.

QUESTION.

MR. RICHARD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he will include in the Papers relating to the trial and deposition of the Gaikwar of Baroda any Correspondence relative to the seat or ceremonial question at the Court of Baroda, raised by the Government of Bombay in December 1872; also any Correspondence relative to the marriage of the Gaikwar in May 1874, and to the issue of such marriage; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will consent to postpone its decision on the question of the succession to the Prince until the Papers respecting his deposition have been laid before Parliament?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, the Papers which we propose to present to Parliament relating to the proceeding of the Commission appointed to inquire into certain charges made against the Gaikwar and to his deposition are very voluminous, and I do not think any practical object would be attained by increasing their bulk by including correspondence upon so irrelevant a matter as a question of precedence raised in 1872. Papers relating to the Gaikwar's marriage will be laid before Parliament. The decision of Her Majesty's Government upon the question of the succession to the Prince was embodied in the Viceroy's Proclamation of the 22nd of April. It is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to postpone or alter that decision.

PARLIAMENT—THE WHITSUNTIDE
RECESS—QUESTION.

MR. STACPOOLE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to his announcement respecting the probable commencement and duration of the Whitsuntide Recess, Whether he will have any objection to move the adjournment of the House from Friday the 14th until Friday the 21st, instead of moving from Thursday the 13th until Thursday the 20th, so as to enable the Royal Residence (Ireland) question, which stands first among the Notices of Motion for Friday the 14th instant, to be debated on that day, and a division taken thereon?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I do not at this moment feel quite sure that it will be my pleasing duty to make a Motion in favour of any holidays; but if we conclude the Peace Preservation Act before Whitsuntide, I think it will be advisable—if we have any holidays at all—that we should adhere to the plan I have already suggested. I shall be happy to discuss it if necessary; but it is a plan similar to that followed by the House until within the last few years, when the holidays have been longer. There is nothing in the condition of Public Business to justify me in the expectation that we can increase the term of relaxation originally contemplated, and even that I have not definitely fixed upon. I take the opportunity of saying that I shall ask the House for a Morning Sitting to-morrow under any circumstances.

MR. STACPOOLE begged to give Notice that he would bring on his Motion relative to a Royal Residence in Ireland on as early a day as possible after Whitsuntide.

ARMY—MILITIA ADJUTANTS.
QUESTION.

COLONEL ALEXANDER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether Adjutants of Militia Regiments who decline to avail themselves of the new retirement scheme will be required, as the alternative, to perform the duties of Adjutants to Brigade Depôts at the headquarters of the sub-district?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, such would be the case.

Lord George Hamilton

CUSTOMS (IRELAND)—OUT-DOOR
OFFICERS.—QUESTION.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether a Petition from the out-door officers of Customs at Dublin and certain other Irish outports, praying that they might be placed on an equality with the out-door officers of Customs in London, and forwarded during the last Session of Parliament, has been received at the Treasury; and, what answer, if any, has been returned to such Petition; and if it remains unanswered, what course the Lords of the Treasury intend adopting with reference to its prayer?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, Petitions were received last year from the out-door officers of Customs at Dublin and certain other out-ports in Ireland, on the subject referred to by the hon. Member. A similar claim has also been frequently advanced on behalf of the various out-ports of the United Kingdom; but the Treasury has uniformly declined to admit it, on the ground that the greater pressure and importance of their duties entitled the officers of Customs in London and Liverpool to a higher rate of pay than officers at out-ports. To this principle the Government continues to adhere, and the Memorialists would have been so informed had it not been that a Commission was appointed to consider the position of the Civil Servants generally, and it therefore seemed unnecessary to take further notice of a claim so often before considered and rejected.

NAVY—NAVY MEDICAL SERVICE—SURGEONS.—QUESTION.

MR. O'LEARY asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, What is the number of surgeons who have tendered their resignation during the last five years; whether the cause assigned for a large number of such resignations at the time of application has not been dissatisfaction at the treatment of medical officers in the Navy; whether he can state the number of cases in which such resignations have been refused; and, whether it is true that the majority of surgeons appointed within the past five years to the Naval Medical Service have been mainly those rejected by the Medical Examining Boards of the Army and Indian Medical Service?

MR. HUNT, in reply, said, that the number of naval surgeons who had tendered their resignation during the last five years was 25; but that the cause assigned for resignation had not in any case been dissatisfaction at the treatment which the medical officers of the Navy had experienced. Six tenders of resignation had been refused temporarily, but ultimately accepted. It was not true that the majority of surgeons appointed within the last five years to the naval medical service had been those rejected by the examining boards of the Army and Indian Medical Service. No person, so rejected, had been received into the Naval service. The hon. Member was probably not aware that there had been a recent Order in Council improving the condition of medical officers in the Navy.

NATIONAL GALLERY—PURCHASE OF PICTURE BY SOLARIO.—QUESTION.

LORD ELCHO said, he desired to ask the Prime Minister a Question, of which he had given private Notice, relative to a fine early Italian portrait by Solario, which during the winter was for sale at Milan. A foreign Government had, he believed, made an offer for it of £1,500 or £1,600, and it was said that our own Government were in treaty for it. He wished to know, Whether there was any prospect of this fine picture being acquired for the National Collection?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I am glad to inform my noble Friend that the portrait now belongs to the British nation.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY complained that Ways and Means had been brought on instead of Supply on Friday night.

MR. W. H. SMITH explained that the Standing Orders provided for either Order being taken first, and he had taken that which was in accordance with the generally expressed wish of the House.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, as I understand the right hon. Gentleman, the Peace Preservation Bill is to be proceeded with to-night, that in any case there will be a Morning Sitting to-morrow, and that on Thursday the third reading of the Peace Preservation Bill will be taken, I rise to ask the right hon.

Gentleman, What other business will be taken on Thursday next?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, the Land Titles and Transfer Bill. With regard to the Peace Preservation Bill, my wish is to take the Report this evening and read the Bill a third time to-morrow morning. That would very much facilitate Public Business, and then we could make arrangements generally satisfactory to the House; but until that Bill is passed it will be impossible to make any definite statement.

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland.)

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. BUTT, in moving the insertion of the following new clause:—

“Whereas by the eighth section of ‘The Protection of Life and Property in certain parts of Ireland Act, 1871,’ it is amongst other things enacted and provided that no writ of habeas corpus shall issue to bring up the body of any person arrested, or committed, or detained as in such section mentioned, and it is expedient that any restriction imposed by such provision shall not be continued: Be it enacted, That from and after the passing of this Act the said section shall be read and construed as if the heretofore recited provision relative to the issue of a writ of habeas corpus had not been continued or inserted therein,” said, he hoped the House would give him its attention for a brief period while he brought the point clearly before it. He confessed, on the general issue, he was unwilling to raise the questions which were fully discussed in Committee; but the present necessity of bringing the subject forward arose from the form in which the Bill was drawn. The form in which the Bill was presented gave no information of the enactments which really were proposed, and a great many questions were brought forward which were in the nature of a surprise. The clause which he now proposed to insert was to the effect that the restrictions placed upon the issue of a Writ of Habeas Corpus by the Act of 1871 should be removed and the law in this respect restored to the state in which it was before the passing of the Westmeath Act. From the days of William III. Habeas Corpus was never interfered with until, by some extraordinary accident, it was interfered with in that Act. In 1803

there was rebellion in Ireland, but no such restriction as he now wished to get rid of was then put on the issue of Writs of Habeas Corpus, even although the country was placed partially under martial law. The clause in question had been inserted in the Westmeath Act without sufficient ground or explanation, and while its removal could do no harm, its continuance might do a great deal of mischief. He asked the Committee to expunge that extraordinary provision on these two grounds—first, because it was a very dangerous principle, and, as he had said, it was the first time in the history of legislation when they had interfered with the Writ of Habeas Corpus in this particular manner; and, secondly, because nothing would be more calculated to irritate the Irish people than to pass a law which disregarded the maxims hitherto held sacred in all coercive laws. They had heard of a message of peace to Ireland, but the real message of peace came from that side of the House, from the 170 English and Scotch Members, when they stood by Ireland in this struggle. That support would have more effect in Ireland in reconciling them to the authority of law than all the coercive Acts that had ever been passed. But if they retained this provision unnecessarily they were adding nothing to the efficiency of the law. The hon. and learned Member concluded by moving his Amendment.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, he could assure his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick that he was as anxious, at the end of their struggles over the Bill, to deal with him as frankly and fairly and as much in a spirit of conciliation as he had professed to be at the commencement of their discussions. His hon. and learned Friend had now moved his Amendment in a somewhat different form from that in which he had proposed it in Committee. He (the Solicitor General for Ireland) had resisted the Amendment in its original shape, partly because he thought it would make a greater change in the Act than at first sight was apparent. That objection had now been removed. He had also resisted the Amendment because the provision to which it related was a matter of small importance compared with the other portions of the Bill which the House had sanctioned, and he believed its presence in the Bill would be useful, without involving the serious consequences which his hon. and learned Friend apprehended. All the previous Acts passed to suspend the operation of the Writ of Habeas Corpus were directed against treasonable conspiracies, and dealt with crimes which were well known and well defined at Common Law and by statute; whereas the Act of 1871 was directed against the Ribbon Conspiracy, a crime not known to the older law; and therefore it was thought necessary to prevent advantage being taken of technical inaccuracies in carrying out their novel enactments. The effect of issuing a Writ of Habeas Corpus in the case of a person confined under the Act of 1871 could only be to bring up the prisoner in person before the Court, when the warrant for his arrest purporting to have been issued under the Act and bearing the signature of the Lord Lieutenant would be produced, and that warrant would be taken as absolutely conclusive. The provision which his hon. and learned Friend now proposed to strike out was inserted, he had no doubt, after mature consideration in 1871 by the late Government and was retained in 1873. Since the last occasion, however, on which the question had been raised in the House, when his hon. and learned Friend had insisted with so much zeal and eloquence on the omission of these words, he (the Solicitor General for Ireland) had had an opportunity of consulting with the Lord Chancellor of Ireland and the English Law Officers of the Crown, and had also had the advantage of conferring with the noble Lord opposite (the Marquess of Hartington); and now, under all the circumstances of the case, though he still adhered to his own opinion that it would be better for the sake of the absolute completeness of the Act that the words in question should be retained in it, yet he was willing to assent to their omission. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend would accept the modification in the spirit in which it was made, and as an evidence that, within the limits of safe concession, the Government were prepared, as far as possible, to meet the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite. But even had those words remained, he could assure his hon. and learned Friend that every possible care would have been taken, as it had been taken hitherto, that those confined under the Act should be subjected to no unnecessary inconvenience. In every possible way, at every stage and step, the proceedings under the Act of 1871 were so surrounded by safeguards as to prevent any possible abuse of the exceptional powers which were given to the Lord Lieutenant.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, that although the point was one of an extremely legal character, he wished to make a few remarks upon it, as he was a Member of the Government which was originally responsible for the introduction of the words in question. Those words were not in the Bill of 1871 when it was first drafted, but they were afterwards adopted by the House, it being the opinion of Baron Dowse, who was at the time Solicitor General for Ireland, that they would make the Act more complete. The point was again raised when the Act was renewed in 1873, and when he was without the assistance of an Irish Law Officer in the House, and was therefore unable to say whether the words were in a legal view necessary or not. He promised, however, to confer on the matter with his legal adviser out-of-doors, and apparently it was considered still desirable that the words should be retained, and they were retained without any discussion on the Report. Baron Dowse having since been referred to, it appeared that although he still thought the Act would be more complete with the words, he did not contend, and, indeed, had never contended, that they were absolutely required. One of the inconveniences which it was said might arise because of their omission was, that motions might be made in the Court of Queen's Bench for Writs of Habeas Corpus with no practical object but that of exciting the public mind, and that it might lead to great inconvenience if such questions were constantly raised. But, on the other hand, it seemed from what occurred in that House that still more serious inconvenience might be created by allegations that it was possible—for the thing had never happened—a prisoner might be treated with undue severity under the Act, and that he would have no means of having his case inquired into. Under those circumstances, when his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland had conferred with him on the subject, a short time ago, he had no hesitation in expressing the opinion that he should be very glad to see the words in question omitted, and he congratulated the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland on being able to dispense with them. He would only add the expression of a hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Limerick would accept the concession in the spirit in which he was sure it was made by the Government, and would admit that in that as well as in other respects they had endeavoured to meet the wishes and just representations of the Irish Members, so far as lay in their power; and that in those provisions of the expiring laws which they had thought it necessary to retain, they had not retained anything which they did not consider absolutely necessary for the peace and security of the country.

New Clause (No restriction to be placed on issue of writs of habeas corpus,)—(Mr. Butt,)—added.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY moved the insertion of the following clause:—

“Provided always and be it enacted: That no person shall be detained in custody under or by virtue of any warrant of the Lord Lieutenant or Chief Secretary, issued under the authority of ‘The Protection of Life and Property in certain parts of Ireland Act, 1871,’ as continued by this Act for any period longer than twelve months from the date of such warrant.”

He contended that no danger whatever would be created by limiting this power of imprisonment, and that such limitation could not in any degree interfere with or diminish the force of the Act. It had been said that, although crime had decreased, it was still necessary to leave the power given by the Act to the Lord Lieutenant; but to argue in that way was to abandon all hopes of governing Ireland by Constitutional Law. If that was a proper time to make any relaxation in the law, surely the best relaxation that could be made would be the removal of the arbitrary power of arrest.

New Clause (No person shall be detained in custody for more than twelve months under the Act of 1871,)—(Mr. O'Shaughnessy,)—brought up, and read the first time.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH hoped the House would re-affirm the decision which the Committee had arrived at, because he saw no reason why less confidence should be reposed in the present Government than in the preceding one. Not long after the present Government came into office, the few persons who remained in custody under the Westmeath Act were discharged, and it had not been found necessary to imprison anyone since. He therefore might fairly appeal to the House to have confidence in the mode in which the Government would administer the Act. But he asked that as full powers might be entrusted to them as to their predecessors, because he had already shown that the power of detaining persons in prison for a longer period than 12 months had from time to time been found necessary in order to carry out these Acts with efficiency. A great deal that had been said as to the mode in which these prisoners might be dealt with was without foundation, because under the provisions of the statute it was necessary that the Lord Lieutenant should make a full investigation before any action was taken. As for the statements that prisoners had been unfairly treated, why, he asked, if such cases existed, had they not been brought under the notice of the House at the time of their occurrence, seeing that every month of the Session a list of the persons in custody under the Act had been presented to Parliament? If these statements had been well founded, the time to bring them forward was when the late Government were in office, who were responsible for their own acts, and could have defended themselves. He wished to impress upon the House that there were fresh safeguards against any improper use of the power conferred by the Act in the clause to which the House had assented. For the case of any prisoner might now not only be brought before the House upon the periodical Returns which were to be made, but might also be brought before one of the Law Courts in Dublin. There was no chance, therefore, of any prisoner being forgotten, and it was the anxious wish and intention of the Government that not a man should be detained in prison under these Acts for a single day longer than was necessary.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that the question was not so much whether these complaints ought to have been made during the existence of the late or present Administration, but whether they were well-founded or not. He was anxious to allude to the case of the prisoner Casey, as he saw in one of the newspapers on Saturday, that "Earl Spencer, the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in another place, gave a flat contradiction to a statement made by Mr. Mitchell Henry in the House of Commons with reference to a man named Casey, arrested under the Westmeath Act." The noble Earl made a long statement regarding the treatment of that prisoner, and complained of the inaccuracies made in regard to him. Now there was not one single word of inaccuracy in the statement which he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had made. Every statement was, indeed, borne out by the noble Earl's own admissions, and had been sustained by the statements made from the official benches on both-sides. Earl Spencer represented him (Mr. Mitchell Henry) as having asserted that the prisoner had been kept in solitary confinement for several years, like a sort of Monte Christo prisoner. Now, he made no such statement. What he said, was that the man had been kept in prison for several years, and that for the greater part of 24 hours he had been kept in solitary confinement. The noble Earl admitted that the man had been kept in solitary confinement for 18 hours out of the 24, and also that for several months there had been no one else in prison with him, so that for the latter part of the time he was kept without association with anybody, and was therefore the whole of the 24 hours kept in solitary confinement. This case was brought under the notice of the House last Session by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Butt) upon a Motion for the production of the Papers under which the man was confined. That Motion was refused by the House; but the present Chief Secretary for Ireland said that the Government had only recently come into power, but that he would make inquiry, and if the man could be safely released, he would release him. The right hon. Gentleman did make inquiries, and did release the man, from which he drew the inference that there were no longer any grounds for detaining him. The Lord Lieutenant for Ireland, however, complained of misrepresentation, because a great many memorials were presented to him in regard to this prisoner, and he made no less than 14 Minutes respecting his case. In that debate the Attorney General stated that no application had been made by the prisoner until the matter was brought before the House, and this was also what he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had stated. He wished to do every justice to a Nobleman who was justly respected in Ireland, and who was one of the most popular and painstaking Lords Lieutenant who had ever been sent across the Channel.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH wished to remind the hon. Member that the statement of the Attorney General referred to the time during which the present Government was in office.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, in that case, he might ask the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, who was present and who took part in the debate, why he had not told the House of these memorials which had been presented? He only wished to do justice to the late Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and that this unfortunate prisoner's case should be fairly placed before the public. For that purpose, he would to-morrow move for Returns in regard to this case—for copies of the memorials, of the Minutes made upon them, and of the medical reports which had induced the Lord Lieutenant to remove Casey from the prison in which his health was breaking down. He had stated the facts literally as they occurred, and as they had been stated over and over again, and not contradicted by the front bench on both sides. His offence was that after relating the facts he had drawn an inference from them. He could come to no other conclusion than that the man had been really forgotten. It now appeared, however, that the man had not been forgotten, because these memorials had been presented for his release. He had been told that his late Friend, Mr. John Martin, would not have sanctioned this statement; but he knew well the sentiments of his late revered Friend, who would have said that he had brought the matter under the attention of the Irish Government and could get no redress, and that the Government would not attend to the remonstrances of the Irish Members, but when the indignation of the English Members was roused, the Chief Secretary made inquiry, and immediately released the man. The case was a lesson in regard to the working of this Act, and as such, he hoped, would never be forgotten. When a man could be arrested in Her Majesty's dominions, and at the will of one man, whoever he might be, could be kept for three years and a-half in solitary confinement, let no hon. Member go on the Continent and boast that no man could be imprisoned in this country except after due trial and conviction. He ought to add that the noble Earl had courteously given him Notice of his intention to bring the matter forward in "another place," and he had given the noble Earl the exact words he had used. The noble Earl, however, had not read that statement in the House of Lords, because, as he was informed, he did not consider it necessary to do so.

LORD ESLINGTON said, the matter had been made the subject of explanation in "another place."

MR. SPEAKER called the noble Lord to Order. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had made a personal explanation, but any further reference to what had taken place in "another place" was irregular.

LORD ESLINGTON said, that the hon. Gentleman who had last spoken accused the Lord Lieutenant of neglect in the case of Casey. He (Lord Eslington) wished to state, on the highest possible authority, that it was an entire mistake to suppose that either in the case of Casey or of any other prisoner sent to gaol under the special powers of the Act in question the attention of the Lord Lieutenant was ever withdrawn from any prisoner. If it was made as a charge against the Lord Lieutenant, he (Lord Eslington) gave it his positive denial, and would affirm that the Lord Lieutenant's attention was constantly and continually directed to that man during the whole time he was in prison.

MR. BIGGAR thought the noble Lord opposite (Lord Eslington) had made out an exceedingly bad case for the Lord Lieutenant. The case of the prisoner Casey was so strong as to show that no Government should be allowed to have the power of keeping a man in gaol untried for such a period of time. What they complained of in Ireland was that men's characters were whispered away by a lot of schemers, whose word could not be taken, if offered, in a Court of Justice. He did not see any difference between the two Governments. They were both bad, and instead of the Bill being a message of peace to Ireland, as the Premier vaunted it to be the other evening, he could not see that it was anything but a Coercion Bill from the beginning to the end. The Irish people would not be content so long as one word of it remained upon the Statute Book.

MR. BUTT said, he wished to recall the attention of the House to the real question to be determined, from which the right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary had attempted to lead them astray. It was not a question of confidence in the right hon. Baronet or in the noble Marquess who preceded him in the office that they had to consider, but whether they should give to any Government whatever such a power as they were now asked to grant—namely, the power of imprisoning a man for an indefinite period? For himself, he thought not; and therefore, in defence of the principles of liberty and of law, he refused to give it to the Government. He appealed to all the old precedents on this subject. This was the first occasion on which they were suspending the Habeas Corpus with so little regard for the subject. The practice was never resorted to in previous times, except when dangerous conspiracies existed, and almost always during war. The Habeas Corpus had been suspended in England and repeatedly in Ireland. In the English Act, however, there was a special provision that no person should remain in prison untried for more than six months. He had looked through the Statute Book since the Union, and back to the time of William III., and he found that in no case had power been given to keep a man in prison untried for more than 12 months. By extending these summary enactments to minor offences they were giving a new power which had not been employed since the Westmeath Act. Casey was detained in prison for four years, but the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary thought it was only for two years and a-half, and he exclaimed in a tone of satisfaction—"Oh! he was only kept in prison without trial for two years and a-half." He had heard it claimed in that House as a merit and a eulogium of the Government in reference to this Bill, that a foreign journalist had written that if the Italian Government wanted to put down brigandage in Sicily they should adopt the principle of the Westmeath Act. He rather thought the British Government had adopted as their model Murat's laws of 1810. There was a time when they used to lecture foreign Powers on the desirability of reconciling order with liberty; now they gave them their Westmeath legislation as a pattern for repressive measures. He would do Earl Spencer the justice to say there never was a Nobleman filling his high office that more earnestly desired to do his duty; but how could he come to any right conclusion when he had always to take the statements of police Inspectors, who placed their views before the Government officials, leaving to others the responsibility of acting on them. He would also admit that the noble Earl, as stated by the noble Marquess, had informed himself as to the particular case of the prisoner Casey; but that in no way altered his (Mr. Butt's) opinion that Casey was harshly and unjustly treated under a law which ought never to have been enacted. Let them suspend the Habeas Corpus by all means in the case of agrarian crime, if they thought fit, but let them give proper security against abuse. Could they not put down that wretched Ribbon conspiracy without employing these extraordinary means, and were they not, by enacting them, telling Ribbonmen that they were stronger than the authority of the British law? They surely could not want greater securities for internal order than they did when the French were in Bantry Bay, and he asked the House not to allow this power to exist for a longer period than 12 months.

THE O'CONOR DON desired to say a few words in explanation of the vote he was about to give. He did not mean to defend the course taken in 1871 by investing the Government with unlimited powers of arrest; but there was an essential difference between now and 1871. In 1871 the Government proposed its Westmeath Bill, and demanded these powers with the avowed purpose of exercising them by arresting the persons whom they deemed dangerous to the public peace. When the Act came into force they arrested those men. But what was the state of things now? The Government said they did not believe there would be a necessity of arresting anyone in those counties; and if they did not, how could they justify the continuance of those powers? There was certainly not the reason for passing such laws now as existed in 1871, and he should therefore support the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Limerick.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, his experience on this question was very different from that of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. For his part, he had never heard any hon. Member for England, Scotland, or Ireland boast of the Acts they were now asked to renew. They were on the contrary regarded—he could certainly speak for himself—with feelings of regret, and he might say, of shame. It was because they felt that exceptional means of repression were necessary, that measures of this sort had been resorted to; and so long as crime of a particular character prevailed in Ireland, so long he should think the Government was justified in coming to Parliament for special powers to repress it. Whichever Government was in office that was a duty which it could not neglect. As for the point before the House, it did not seem to be one of vital importance. It seemed to him that to pass the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick would place the Lord Lieutenant and the Irish Government in an invidious position. The Act would not only give him power, but would make him responsible for the exercise of it, and compel him to use it where necessary. If, therefore, a person were arrested, and at the end of 12 months the reasons which led to his arrest still existed, the Lord Lieutenant, if he undertook the responsibility the Act would cast upon him, would be bound to re-arrest the person immediately on his discharge. The adoption of the Amendment would, therefore, throw upon the Lord Lieutenant a very disagreeable and unnecessary responsibility. With respect to the case referred to by the hon. Member for Galway, there was no longer any necessity for a defence of the late Lord Lieutenant. The hon. Member had acquitted his noble Friend of any want of care and attention in the matter, and had transferred the charge to the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland, and to himself (the Marquess of Hartington). But why had not a full explanation been given last year in reference to the case? Because no Notice that it was to be brought on had been given. ["No!"] Certainly, no Notice had been given to him.

MR. BUTT said, he had given Notice in the usual way of a Motion for affidavits which reflected upon the action of the Irish Government.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: The case to which the hon. and learned Gentleman referred was brought forward incidentally, and it was impossible that an Irish Secretary who had to attend principally to the business in that House could at a moment's notice answer as to every case which might be mentioned. With reference to the case in question, his right hon. Friend opposite gave to the hon. and learned Member all the information that was required, and he, himself, without going into the particulars of the case, stated that all those matters had been carefully inquired into, especially by the Lord Lieutenant and the Law Officers of the Crown. His (the Marquess of Hartington's) duties lying more in connection with the House than with the administration of the Acts in Ireland, he was not so fully acquainted with those cases as was his noble Friend; but he asserted then, and was justified in the assertion, that not one of those cases had been overlooked, and that no prisoner was detained in custody a moment longer than was required by the circumstances which had led to his arrest.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he wished to offer a word of personal explanation. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), had given him Notice of a Question which the Forms of the House did not permit him to put, but to which he hoped he might be allowed to refer for the purpose of making a personal explanation. He was asked to explain why it was he had stated "in the name of the Irish Members," that they were satisfied with the courtesy which had been extended to them by the Government during the progress of the Bill. A similar demand had been made of him by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for the City of Waterford, and as he had been misrepresented in the Irish Press for what he had said, he would read the reply he had sent to his hon. and gallant Friend. The reply would be the answer to both questions.

MAJOR O'GORMAN: I rise to Order, Sir. If the hon. Gentleman is going to read his reply to me, I hope he will first read my letter to him.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, he had no objection. It was dated 7th of May, and ran as followed:—

"My dear Sir,—I perceive that The Pall Mall Gazette and The Daily Telegraph report you as having said in the debate on the Coercion Bill that on behalf of the Irish Members you thanked the Government for their courtesy during the discussion. I should be much obliged by your informing me whether or not I, as one of the Irish Members, authorized you to make such a declaration on my behalf, and if not, how it came to pass that you made such a declaration."

In his (Mr. Downing's) reply, he stated—

"In reply, I have to inform you that I made no such declaration. If I had it would have been an assumption on my part unwarrantable and indefensible."

Until he received the hon. and gallant Member's letter he had not read any report of the proceedings on Thursday evening, but he then referred to the newspapers. He found in the Parliamentary review in The Pall Mall Gazette that reference to him was only made, and that no report of the proceedings was given. The Daily Telegraph reported him as speaking on behalf of Irish Members, but that was a mistake of the reporter—probably arising from the low tone in which he spoke; but the paper which gave the fullest and most accurate report, The Times, reported him as speaking of himself individually, and what he said was that he acknowledged the fair consideration that the Irish Members had received from both sides of the House, and that in the discussion of national and constitutional questions of great importance English and Scotch Members had given them a large support, and he added, as would be found in The Standard report, that, on the whole, he thought the majority of the Irish Members would be satisfied with the manner in which they had been met by the Government with regard to the proposals made by Irish Members. In continuation, he wrote—

"I would not have so expressed myself, if I had not felt justified in doing so, and I do not now desire to withdraw a single word that I uttered upon that occasion, and for which I hold myself responsible to no Member or Members of the House. I must in conclusion say, that I think your letter to me is more formal than it need have been, and that you might in a friendly way have mentioned the matter to me, and not have made it a matter of correspondence."

MAJOR O'GORMAN requested that the hon. Member for Cork would read his answer to that letter.

MR. BIGGAR rose to make a personal explanation. ["Spoke!"] He thought it was only fair to the House and to himself that the communication on this subject which he addressed to the hon. Member for Cork should be read verbatim.

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Member that he had already addressed the House on the question, and had exhausted his right of speech.

MR. RONAYNE wished to give the reasons which induced him to speak on the subject on Thursday evening. He understood the hon. Member for Cork to say that, in the absence of the hon. Member for Limerick, he spoke for Irish Members. ["No," and "Question!"] If the hon. Member only proffered the conventional shake of the hand between the victim and Calcraft before the drop scene, of course he was at liberty to do so; and he (Mr. Ronayne) had no more to say upon the subject, except it was that having always received courtesy from the occupants of the Treasury benches he was not surprised that the party had received it now.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that seeing a great number of Members had entered the House in the prospect of a division, he wished briefly to state the importance of the question upon which they would vote. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick wished to take away from the Lord Lieutenant the power of imprisonment, including the suspension of the Habeas Corpus. To that Amendment he should give his cordial support, and he most earnestly appealed to every hon. Member in that House on either side who wished to send a message of peace to Ireland to vote in support of the new clause. He believed that the question before the House must be examined on two points. 1. The nature of the imprisonment, and 2. The period over which the imprisonment should extend. The imprisonment would be on suspicion only, for there could be no proof of guilt; and he thought in the present age of electric telegraph and steam, that a reasonable limit should be placed on the period for which a person could be detained, whilst evidence was being obtained. With reference to the matter introduced by his hon. Friend the Member for Cavan, he wished to say that the hon. Member for Cork had misquoted the question which it was the intention of the hon. Member for Cavan to put to him. That hon. Member merely called in question the statement that the Irish Members had received any consideration from the Government, and the question which the hon. Member intended to ask was, whether the hon. Member for Cork, on Thursday the 6th instant, spoke as follows:—"That he took the opportunity, on behalf of the Irish Members, to state that during the discussion they had received every consideration from the Government." Hon. Members would see that there was a great difference between "courtesy" and "consideration." He believed the hon. Member for Cavan was as ready as anyone to acknowledge that they had been treated with courtesy; but he concurred with the hon. Member in saying that they had no thanks whatever to give for consideration.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the said Clause be now read a second time."

The House divided:—Ayes 146; Noes 239: Majority 93.

Clause 3 (Continuance of Peace Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1870, subject to amendments and modification).

CAPTAIN NOLAN, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 16, to leave out "eighty," and insert "seventy-seven," said, two years had been the limit in all previous Acts of this kind, and he saw no reason why the period should be extended on this occasion, save that it would benefit Gentlemen opposite. There were three distinct views prevailing in the House as to the necessity of the Bill, but each of them, on consideration, led to the conclusion that it was good party policy for the Conservatives to shelve the question for five years instead of passing it for two years. The first theory was that of hon. Gentlemen who sat below the Gangway on that (the Opposition) side of the House—and he was glad to say that it was not only entertained by Irish Members, but by some Englishmen also—and it was that the Bill was unnecessary for either five or two years; another theory was that the Bill was necessary for five years; and the third—that of hon. Gentlemen above the Gangway on the Opposition side—that it was necessary for two years. There was only one supposition on which the Bill was a good one, and that was that it was of such national importance that the Conservatives should sit on the front Ministerial Benches, that every other interest should give way to this consideration. The present Bill, theoretically and practically, was against the Constitution, and in this respect it was so far unlike the Mutiny Bill to which it had been compared, for the latter was only theoretically unconstitutional. The measure that they were discussing, then, should be passed for two years rather than five.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 16, to leave out the word "eighty," in order to insert the words "seventy-seven," — (Captain Nolan,) — instead thereof.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, there was nothing in the conduct of the Government in regard to this Bill that justified the imputation of the hon. and gallant Member. Matters of this kind were above Party considerations, and for himself, he affirmed that if not in office Party differences would not prevent him from supporting any Government in proposals that were necessary to secure peace and order in Ireland. They believed there was no reasonable ground for hoping that in a less period than five years it would be possible throughout the whole of Ireland to dispense with the restrictions upon the possession of arms and the other mild provisions of the existing law which that Bill proposed to re-enact. They feared there would be places in Ireland where these modified restrictions would continue for some years to be necessary, and he asked the Committee to entrust them with these powers for that period. Besides, it was thought more satisfactory to deal with the question at once for five years than to have it brought up, as it would be if the hon. Member's views were adopted, for frequent discussion.

Question put, "That the word 'eighty' stand part of the Bill."

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN, in moving an Amendment providing, that any proclamation issued under any of the provisions contained in the Act, and which should be in force at the time of its passing, should, unless previously revoked, continue in force until the 31st of December, and not for a longer period, unless the Lord Lieutenant, with the advice of the Privy Council for Ireland, to be published in The Dublin Gazette, should make a declaration to that effect, said, that the terms of the Amendment were somewhat different from those moved in Committee by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, in that the limit proposed by that hon. Gentleman was extended from the 1st of August to the 31st of December. The Amendment did not affect the principle of the Bill; but he thought due consideration should be given to the subject, and as the proclamations would die out on the 31st of December the Government would before that time have the opportunity of considering whether they ought to be renewed or not.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 16, after the word "eighty," to insert the words "Provided always, That any proclamation issued under any of the provisions hereby continued, and which shall be in force at the time of the passing of this Act, shall, unless previously revoked, continue in force until the thirty-first day of December next, but shall not continue longer in force unless the Lord Lieutenant, by a new proclamation to be made by and with the advice of the Privy Council of Ireland and published in the Dublin Gazette, shall declare and direct that the said former proclamation shall be and continue in force after the said day; and thereupon such proclamation shall so continue in force."—(Sir Patrick O'Brien.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH pointed out that the practical effect of the Amendment, if it were put in operation, would be the revocation of all proclamations on the 31st of December, whether the state of the country justified that revocation or not. Then, if the Government found that they ought not to be dispensed with, they would have to be re-imposed. He had already given an undertaking that all proclamations in force after the passing of the Act would be carefully reconsidered, and he hoped to be able to revoke some proclamations in quiet districts of Ireland. The Amendment therefore, could have no practical effect; while it would seem to imply a want of confidence in the Government, which had not yet been expressed by Parliament.

Sir Patrick O'Brien

MR. BUTT accepted the right hon. Baronet's assurance, that all existing proclamations would be reviewed, with the object, where it could safely be done, of revoking them, and upon that understanding he recommended his hon. Friend the Member for the King's County to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. O'SULLIVAN, in moving an Amendment, to the effect that where a person was licensed to have arms in his house, he should be at liberty to carry them upon lands in his occupation adjoining his residence, said, that if a man was deemed worthy by the magistrates of the district to have a gun in his house, he did not see any reasonable objection that could be urged against allowing him the privilege of carrying them for the protection of his property in the immediate vicinity of his dwelling.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 19, to leave out from the word "authorised" to the word "endorsement," in line 25, in order to insert the words "so licensed to carry such arms while upon any lands in his occupation adjoining his residence," — (Mr. O'Sullivan.)

--instead thereof.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH did not consider the question one of any great importance; but still he retained the opinion that to adopt the proposal of the hon. Member for Limerick would be rather to diminish the number of arms licences than to increase them. All that a person having a licence to keep a gun in his house would be required to do, if he wanted to carry arms on his lands, was to go to the nearest resident magistrate and ask for an endorsement. The only advantage of the Amendment, therefore, would be that people who were already allowed to have arms in their houses would be saved the trouble of going to a magistrate, if they wished to carry them on their lands. On the other hand, there was this disadvantage attending it, that the issue of licences merely to have arms in a house might be restricted in consequence of its adoption.

Question, "That the words 'authorised to grant such licences in such proclaimed district' stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

MR. BRUEN said, the Government had conceded the point that, on the recommendation of two magistrates residing in the same petty sessional division as the applicant, a licence to carry a gun should be granted; and, as the great argument in support of the Amendment was that farmers required a gun to protect their crops from birds, he would accordingly move, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 26, after the word "grant," to insert "to any occupier of one or more agricultural holdings." He thought the power of granting those certificates should not be exercised wholesale, and therefore he desired to limit the power of the local magistrates.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 26, after the word "grant," to insert the words "to any occupier of one or more agricultural holdings."—(Mr. Bruen.)

MR. BUTT hoped the Government would not assent to this change in the concession which had been agreed to on the subject. He saw no real good to be derived from this special restriction.

MR. GIBSON said, it had been suggested in a previous debate, that a licence might be properly granted by two justices to a neighbour to kill crows, and this Amendment was fair and reasonable, and in furtherance of that suggestion.

MR. O'SULLIVAN opposed the Amendment, on the ground that it would tend to limit the power of carrying arms.

MR. BIGGAR also opposed the Amendment. He thought it a shame and a disgrace to the Government that it should bring in a coercive Bill of this kind, and press it through the House in the way they were doing.

VISCOUNT CRICHTON hoped the Amendment of the hon. Member for Carlow would be accepted, as it met directly a point very much raised by hon. Members opposite, the necessity of giving security to farmers against the ravages made on their crops by crows. He hoped the Government would support the Amendment.

MR. P. MARTIN said, he hoped the clause would be allowed to remain in the state in which it was framed by the right hon. Baronet who had charge of the Bill, and that the Government would not listen to the promptings of extreme

Members, who seemed inclined to draw the Government into difficulty.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he very much regretted that the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen) was unable to attend the discussion of the Bill in Committee, because had his (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach's) attention been drawn to this point when he accepted the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, he should have felt it his duty to modify it at the time in some such way as was now proposed. If the clause were allowed to remain as it was the operation of the Bill would be alike in town and country, whether under borough or under county magistrates. The Amendment had certainly come from the Government side of the House; but he was unable to see why the only alterations the Government were to accede to should be those which proceeded from the other side of the House. They ought not to be called upon to reject an Amendment, because it came from that—the Ministerial—side of the House, always provided that it was supported by argument, and shown to be an improvement upon the provisions of the measure. When the Bill was in Committee not a word was said as to the advisability or necessity of extending the number of licences in towns, but he had been since advised that the clause would, as it stood, apply as well to towns as to agricultural districts, although, from the manner of its wording, no one could have supposed that it would have this effect. He was not aware that in the towns in Ireland there was any particular desire for licences to carry arms; but, if there were, the demand had not been made on their behalf in that House. But if the possession of arms became general in the towns, there were many places where the consequences might be very serious to the public peace, especially on the occasion of elections and of party processions. He could name, he was sorry to say, towns in the South of Ireland in which the spirit of disaffection prevailed to such a degree that concealed stores of arms had only recently been discovered, and Militia rifles had been stolen from the military depôts. Those were facts which the Government must consider in dealing with the matter. It was in reference to the country that he had originally accepted the Amendment. He did not suppose that the magistrates, whether of counties or boroughs, would wilfully grant licences to carry arms to persons who would use them in party warfare or rebellion. If they were to do so, the remedy would be in the hands of the Government; but he knew that certificates to character were too readily signed, and that magistrates might be found, who, out of easy good nature, and without taking the trouble to inquire into the character of the people, would grant those certificates, feeling that in doing so they were not incurring the responsibility of granting licences. Feeling that, and looking upon the paragraph as one intended and framed to apply to the country rather than to towns; feeling, also, that if the extension of licences to carry arms was wanted at all it was in the country and not in towns, he was disposed to accede to the modification in the paragraph suggested by the hon. Member.

CAPTAIN NOLAN thought that the Chief Secretary and the Ministry had shifted their ground two or three times on this subject. They had been told that the Act was necessary in consequence of agrarian outrages; but "agrarian" was something connected with the land, and yet, as agricultural holdings were referred to in this Amendment, the only persons who were to have arms were those who had been committing the murders. The modification to which the Government had now given its sanction showed that they were afraid to trust their own magistrates. The whole course of the Bill showed that it was a Game Bill pure and simple. It was urged upon the Government by persons who were interested in the maintenance of the Game Laws; but if this Bill passed with the Amendment, the Government might just as well write on the back of the Bill—"This is a Game Law."

MR. KAVANAGH expressed his regret at the concession which Her Majesty's Government had made, and he was only satisfied with it now on the understanding that the right hon. Gentleman accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member for Carlow. The hon. and gallant Member for Galway had accused the magistrates of Ireland of using the Peace Preservation Act to preserve the game; and notwithstanding he now pressed for increased power to be placed in their hands. The plea on which it was urged that greater facilities of obtaining licences to carry arms should be afforded to the rural inhabitants was to enable them to defend their crops from the depredations of the crows; but he was at a loss to understand how that held good with reference to the urban population, as it was not the habit of crows either to frequent, or commit depredations, in the streets of towns. The effect of the Amendment of his hon. Friend would only be to restrict the concession to the rural districts, and as such he was glad that the Government had accepted it.

MR. REDMOND said, that he could not understand why the Government placed less confidence in magistrates of towns than in those of country. He was sorry to see the Government were now backing out of one of the concessions they had made in reference to the clause, to which the Amendment of the hon. Member for Carlow applied.

MR. CONOLLY contended that the Government were justified in accepting the Amendment, which he must say had no relation whatever to the subject of game.

MR. O'SULLIVAN opposed the Amendment, which he contended was introduced with a view of limiting the power of the magistrates to grant licences to persons in towns to carry arms.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, the Amendment would cause great dissatisfaction in Ireland. An Amendment which would enable a farm labourer who had an acre of land a mile from a town to have a licence to carry arms, whilst it withheld from a man who had lived in the town the same privilege, was an insult to Ireland.

MR. O'NEILL supported the Amendment of the hon. Member for Carlow. He thought it would not show the least want of confidence in the magistrates.

MR. SULLIVAN expressed his regret that the Government had consented to give way, for by doing so they had undone all the concessions previously granted on the subject. The fact of its having done so proved that the change now proposed was brought about by a caucus, whose influence in Parliament had not now been exercised for the first time. He meant that it was influenced by the "Ultra-Marine" Club in Dublin, who, finding that the Government had thus given way to the Irish Members in relation to the subject, had expressed their determination to influence the Government to limit and hedge the concession that had been made in a manner that would give offence to the people of Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland knew well the effect of the concession which he had made to the Irish Members when the subject was formerly before the House.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH begged to say that at the time he made the concession referred to he did not see the full scope of the Amendment then proposed.

MR. SULLIVAN said, of course, he must accept the denial of the right hon. Gentleman; but there could be little doubt of the fact that it was owing to the conduct of the Dublin Club, to which he had already alluded, that a Minister of high personal character and ability was still liable to be forced to wheel to the right-about at the behest of a faction which had been the author of the worst evils of Ireland. Five days ago the journals of that party had stated, with menace, that the right hon. Gentleman would have to accept such a proposal as this, and sure enough he had done so.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 122; Noes 84: Majority 38.

MR. BRUEN moved, as an Amendment, in page 2, line 27, to leave out from "upon" to "shall," in line 29, and insert "any lands occupied by him provided he." The Amendment would have the effect of bringing the clause into accordance with the Amendment just agreed to, and would confine the Act to licences to carry arms to the occupiers of such holding or holdings. As to raising the question again, he repudiated the motives ascribed to him by hon. Members opposite, and denied that he was the representative of a party which differed from the Government.

Amendment proposed, in page 2, line 27, to leave out from the word "upon" to the word "shall," in line 29, in order to insert the words "any lands occupied by him provided he,"—(Mr. Bruen),—instead thereof.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, the clause was very carefully considered in Committee, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, after much consideration, at length saw his way clearly to the concessions he had made. By the Amendment just agreed to, however, the Government had cut off one-half of that concession, and now it was by the present, which raised a totally different question, proposed to cut off a moiety of the remaining half, and to restrict the granting of licences to carry to only the actual occupier of the holdings, though, as had been shown, these were in many cases women. He trusted the Chief Secretary would not consent to this withdrawal of the second part of his concession granted after full deliberation.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he had already explained to the House the reasons which induced him to accede to the first Amendment moved by the hon. Member for the county of Carlow; but as to the Amendment now under consideration, he agreed with the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just sat down, that it did not raise precisely the same question. He thought the words proposed by the hon. Member for the county of Carlow would limit the operation of the paragraph in a way that he should not like to agree to, for it would perhaps prevent a licensed person from carrying arms from his own residence to the land that was occupied by him; and he would, therefore, suggest that, instead of this Amendment, they might insert words providing that upon the certificate of the two magistrates the licensing officer might grant a licence within the district in which the magistrates had jurisdiction. ["No, no!"] If that was not done the result might be that, as in many cases the district of the licensing officer extended beyond a county borough, the certificate of magistrates might be held to be valid in places in which they had no legal jurisdiction.

MR. BUTT said, there was matter of much greater importance than the mere alteration of words raised by the course which had been taken by the right hon. Gentleman. These Amendments struck at the root of Irish liberties, and they were proposed not by the Government, but at the bidding of a dark cabal, the enemies of the Irish Members. The right hon. Baronet the Chief Secretary was now taking away concessions which the Government had openly granted after due consideration. He would remind the right hon. Baronet of the words—"Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel." The meaning of these words was to destroy those concessions which had been granted, and what confidence could they have in the Government if they allowed themselves to be guided in this way by what he would not call the miserable remnant of an expiring faction, who were unable to give strength to the Government, but who were able to mislead them, and induce them to abandon a course which had given satisfaction, and adopt another for which no good reason had been shown. It was not the first time that this course had been adopted, and he looked upon it as miserably trifling. The Government had placed themselves in the hands of the enemies of the Irish people. Of course, they loved the Irish people so well that they would not give them the privileges of carrying arms except under the most stringent and degrading restrictions. If two magistrates could not vouch for the fitness of people to carry arms, the Amendment he had previously proposed ought not to have been adopted; and if they could guarantee the fitness of people to have that right, there was no necessity for these restrictions. He said it was the Government itself which was teaching the people to distrust the magistracy and the administration of the law, and to have no confidence in the Government. Let the right hon. Gentleman understand that on this Amendment he was upon his trial before the people of Ireland. Let him make his choice between them and their determined hostility. No soft words, no honeyed expression, could escape that result. He (Mr. Butt) had read of one who was —"the mildest-mannered man

That ever scuttled ship or cut a throat;"

and he could assure the right hon. Baronet that the mildness of Lambro's manners would no more have saved him from conviction on a charge of piracy than honeyed phrase would save the Chief Secretary for Ireland from condemnation for supporting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Carlow. He (Mr. Butt) really did feel warm. He had endeavoured to give credit to the right hon. Gentleman when he thought he could honestly do so; but he had looked for different treatment from the Government, expecting that the Chief Secretary had firmness enough not to be controlled by the extreme Gentlemen behind him.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: In explanation I wish to say that the hon. and learned Gentleman has misunderstood me. What I said was that I objected to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Carlow.

MR. BUTT said, if that was so his ears had deceived him. He certainly understood the right hon. Baronet as supporting the spirit of the Amendment and objecting only to its form.

MR. CONOLLY said, the hon. Gentlemen on that—the Government—side of the House were not accustomed to the menacing tone which the hon. and learned Member for Limerick had adopted. That was the first time in that House that he had ever heard a set of Gentlemen who were honestly discharging their duty characterized as a "faction" and a "cabal." The use of such un-Parliamentary epithets, it was plain, was only resorted to for one purpose, and that was, that those who used them might go before the Irish people, in the hope that they might deter the Conservative Members from doing their duty in that House. But let him tell the Irish Members on the other side that, although they were more numerous than those on that side, their transient popularity in insulting their brethren from Ireland would not sustain them. He deliberately charged hon. Members opposite with having insulted their brethren from Ireland by applying to them the terms "cabal" and "faction."

MR. CALLAN rose to Order. He wished to know whether the hon. Member was justified in deliberately charging hon. Members on that (the Opposition) side with improper, dishonourable, and illegal proceedings. He protested against it.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is quite in Order.

MR. CONOLLY said, he had used no such terms; but they were mentioned on the other side, to the great disgrace of hon. Gentlemen sitting there. He had not done with those hon. Gentlemen yet, because that system of vilification had now been established and persisted in beyond all precedent. It was only the other night that he had to refer to an

hon. Gentleman who had a journal widely circulated in Ireland, and not satisfied with the power he possessed of attacking hon. Gentlemen in that House, which was very fair when they were there to answer him, he used this weapon behind their backs to vilify them in Ireland. When he saw them face to face he did not dare to bring forward these nocturnal and clandestine observations. The tone of hon. Gentlemen opposite had hitherto during these discussions been somewhat moderate; but that evening they had transgressed the ordinary bounds, and owed a personal apology to those to whom they had alluded as a "faction" and a "cabal," their object in thus stigmatizing them being to put a false impression on their conduct in the estimation of their constituents.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING confessed that if he had known that the right hon. Gentleman had intended to yield to the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Carlow (Mr. Bruen), he should never have risen in his place to pay a compliment to the Irish Executive. By that concession the right hon. Gentlemen had destroyed all the concessions he had made in agreeing to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick. In doing so, he (Mr. Downing) could not give the right hon. Gentleman credit for candour, because in agreeing to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Carlow, a man living within half a mile of a petty sessional district taking out a licence to carry arms would only be able to carry them for that half mile, and if he crossed the boundary of that petty sessional district he would be amenable to this Act. Such a provision was, he would not say "disgraceful" or "mean," but certainly not creditable to the Government, and when he returned to Ireland he should say that they had pretended to yield concessions which really had not been yielded.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKET) said, the right hon. Gentleman behind him merely suggested that if the Amendment of the hon. Member for Carlow should not be accepted, some words might be introduced which would limit the jurisdiction of the magistrates in reference to the granting of licences to carry arms within the bounds in which they exercised jurisdiction in relation to their other magisterial duties. When hon. Gentlemen accused the Government of having done nothing that evening but yield to hon. Gentlemen behind them, he must remind them that early in the discussion they granted a most important concession on the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, that during the discussions in the late Parliament on the Disestablishment of the Irish Church and the Army Bill nothing was more common than to say the proceedings were promoted by "factions." The late Government in dealing with Irish questions had no Law Officer, and the present Government would have none, if it were not for the existence of the Protestant University of Dublin, which gave them the assistance of two Conservative Law Officers. But with that legal advice, it was not surprising they still believed that Ireland required a very stringent Bill. The other night when compliments were passing between the two sides of the House, he (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had objected to that proceeding, because he knew that before the Bill was out of the House, they would see that the gloved hand which the Government displayed had claws at the end of it. At present none but a resident magistrate could give a licence for carrying arms, and that power had been exercised with gross partiality. There were numerous complaints in Ireland of the capricious and illegal manner in which resident magistrates had refused to grant those licences, and he was surprised the Government should think it inadvisable to grant this concession. In one instance, while the late Administration were in office, the manager of a bank was capriciously refused a licence by a resident magistrate; and on the circumstances of the case being afterwards brought under the notice of the then Chief Secretary, the noble Marquess required that resident magistrate to offer an apology to the applicant, and also to grant him a licence. The Government had agreed the other night to require a resident magistrate to grant a licence on the recommendation of two Justices; and they were now not only retracting that concession, but showing to the people of the Three Kingdoms that they were ready to play fast-and-loose with the provisions of a Bill which was far more stringent than any measure their presentment shall be made under the authority aforesaid."—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING thought it very hard indeed that the whole of the peaceful residents of a district, altogether innocent of the matter, should be punished because some one among them withheld information.

MR. BUTT moved to amend the proposed Amendment by inserting words which would require that the Grand Jury should be of opinion that material evidence was withheld with the general assent of the population resident in the district. There were cases in which the provision as it stood could not properly be enforced, for evidence might be withheld without in any way implicating the district in sympathy with the crime. For instance, it might be the wife or the child or the parent of the offender who withheld the evidence, as was natural, while the general body of the residents knew nothing whatever about it. However, he would leave the matter in the hands of the Government.

Amendment proposed to the said proposed Amendment, to leave out the words "by any person," and insert the words "with the general assent of the population," — (Mr. Butt,) — instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the said proposed Amendment."

THE O'CONOR DON thought the right hon. Baronet had redeemed the pledge he had given, and he therefore hoped that the Amendment just moved would not be pressed to a division. He concurred, however, in the proposed modification, which was within the spirit of the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Baronet. He would mention the case of a man who, having been wounded in the arm, applied to the Grand Jury of the King's County for compensation and obtained it, although the Grand Jury knew well that he could have given information as to who was the perpetrator of the outrage from which he suffered. It would be unfair to charge upon a locality this heavy tax in many cases which would be covered by the proposition as it stood.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the words in his Amendment had been very carefully framed, in order to carry out the undertaking he gave when the Bill was in Committee. They would very much increase the difficulty of giving compensation, and were intended to increase it; but the words proposed by the hon. and learned Member would make this difficulty insuperable. He could not go further than he did in the change now proposed.

Amendment to the said proposed Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question,

"That the words 'unless the grand jury making the same shall be of opinion that material evidence concerning the murder, maiming, or injury in respect of which such presentment is made is withheld by any person resident within the district proposed to be charged with the sum thereby presented; and where any such presentment shall be made under the authority aforesaid,' be inserted in page 4, line 20, after '1871,'"

—put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of MR. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Plunket) Amendment made in page 4, line 34, after "section," by inserting "thirty-nine amended as aforesaid."

MR. BUTT moved a Proviso at the end of clause, limiting to 2s. in the pound the amount of a presentment when finally fixed and settled by the Judge. The principle of the Amendment was discussed in Committee. The amount to be levied on presentments would often amount to 5s. or 6s. in the pound—a rate perfectly ruinous to many individuals. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. R. Smyth) had proposed to fix the limit at 1s. in the pound. He (Mr. Butt) proposed to fix it at 2s.—an amount quite enough for an honest man to have to pay for the misfortune of living among persons who sympathized with crime.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 35, to add, at the end of Clause 3, the words "Provided always, That no such presentment shall be finally settled or approved of by the judge in such a form that the sum to be levied under such presentment shall exceed in the whole the amount of two shillings upon each pound of the valuation of the district upon which same shall be charged."—(Mr. Butt.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he must oppose the Motion, and for the same reasons as he stated in Committee.

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The House divided:—Ayes 93; Noes 211: Majority 118.

MR. BUTT moved a Proviso, to the effect that the sum to be levied by order of the Lord Lieutenant to defray the charge of additional police in a district under the Crime and Outrage Act, should not exceed 2s. in the pound on the valuation of the holdings in that district.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words "Provided always, That from and after the passing of this Act the sum to be levied in any district under the seventh and eighth Clauses of the Act passed in the eleventh year of the reign of Her Majesty, entitled 'An Act for the better prevention of Crime and Outrage in certain parts of Ireland, until the first day of December one thousand eight hundred and forty-nine, and the end of then next Session of Parliament,' shall not exceed the amount of two shillings on each pound of the valuation of the district on which the same is charged."—(Mr. Butt.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would be content with the opinion which had already been expressed on this subject, and would not press his Amendment to a division.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA referred to a communication which he had received before the passing of the Westmeath Act from a resident magistrate in Westmeath, to the effect that if the police would do their work properly, 80 per cent of the crime in that county would be stopped, and the remaining 20 per cent would be stopped if the people were fairly treated. He trusted the Government would yet find some means of mitigating the cost of crime to innocent persons.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING urged that the charge for additional police should be dealt with not by the Lord Lieutenant, who relied for information upon a single individual—namely, a police magistrate, but by the Grand Jury, consisting of a large number of gentlemen who were fully acquainted with all the circumstances of the district.

The House divided:—Ayes 84; Noes 206: Majority 122.

MR. BUTT, who had given Notice of Amendments to move the omission of Clause 4, and also to move an alteration in Schedule A, said, that at that late period of the night he would not press his Amendments.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA, who also had an Amendment to Schedule A, said, he would follow the example of the hon. and learned Member for Limerick.

Amendments, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL for IRELAND (Mr. Plunket) the following new Schedule agreed to, and added to the Bill:—

"Schedule (D).

[BILL 105.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that, in answer to a Question put by the hon. and learned Member for the County of Denbigh (Mr. Osborne Morgan) on Friday last, he had said that most of the hon. Members who took part in the debate on the Bill last year were willing that the second reading should be proceeded with this year without discussion, and that the debate should be taken on the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair. Believing that to be in accordance with the views of the House, he would now move the second reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the second time."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

MR. OSBORNE MORGAN said, he had assented to the appeal made to him; but he trusted that the Government would see their way to taking the discussion on the Speaker leaving the Chair at a period of the Session when it might be fully discussed. If it were relegated to the middle or the end of July, when half the lawyers of the House had gone on circuit, it could not be properly considered.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER also hoped that the Attorney General would fix a time to insure the fullest discussion. He intended to oppose the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL hoped that the Bill would receive the same full measure of criticism that it did last year, and every opportunity would be given, so far as he was concerned.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday 24th May.

CHIMNEY SWEEPERS BILL. (No. 71.)

(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY, in moving the second reading of the Bill, said, it had been his sad duty to address their Lordships twice already on this painful subject—once in 1853, again in 1864, and now again in 1875. Although he was compelled, in the interest of his clients, to stand for a time that evening, between them and a larger question, they would not, he was sure, be averted by the apparent meanness of the cause—far from mean, in fact, since it concerned the temporal and eternal welfare of some thousands of children, the most oppressed, degraded, and tortured creatures on the face of the earth. It was through their Lordships' House, and by their aid, that he hoped to appeal finally and effectively to public opinion. This "Chamber of Horrors" had long been open before us. The earliest trace of interest he could find was in the year 1773, when the matter was in the hands of Mr. Jonas Hanway; and in 1788 a Bill was passed by both Houses for the protection of climbing boys. Thus this terrible system had now been before the public for more than 100 years, and for 85 had been the subject of legislation. And yet the evil, wherever it prevailed, was, and was of necessity, as great as ever. He need not trouble them with the several provisions of the successive Acts. It was sufficient to say that all were marked by timidity, though with kind intentions, and all were far short of the necessity, proved by the character of the evidence, and the safety of the remedy proposed. Here were the stages of legislation:—The first Act was in 1788—the 28th of George III. It was a good Bill in many respects as passed by the Commons, but it was detrimentally altered in the House of Lords. It passed, however, into a law, and continued so until 1834. But matters had become so bad in 1817 that the House of Commons passed an amending Bill, which, though highly approved by the Select Committee, to which it had been referred, was lost on the third reading in the House of Lords. Then came the Act of 1834. This was repealed by the Act of 1840, brought in by Mr. Fox Maule, the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department. This Act re-affirmed all the strictest provisions as to the structure of chimneys contained in the Act of 1834; it provided that no apprentices should be taken under 16 years of age, and it was the first that prohibited climbing boys altogether by enacting that none under 21 years of age should be allowed to ascend or descend flues. In 1853 he himself brought in a Bill to meet, if possible, the constant evasions of the Act; but this Bill was lost. In 1864 he brought in another Bill to remove some of those defects. It passed into a law, but, from a variety of reasons, had been inoperative in many parts of the Provinces. He would now call their attention to the evidence of oppression and suffering from 1773 to the present day. He again offered an apology for this drain on their time and patience; but they would see, he was sure, that this question was one of evidence and fact, and not simply one of appeal and argumentation. In 1788 there was no evidence taken before Parliamentary Committees, but the case must have been very clear and strong to move the two Houses to pass a restrictive measure when there was little or no force in public opinion, perhaps scarcely any existence of it, and when the Press had not attained the hundredth part of its present power. In 1817 there was abundant and frightful evidence taken before both Houses. He would give a sample of it, to show that the evil was the same now as then, and without any abatement. First, he would ask their Lordships to observe how great, compared with to-day, was the patronage extended to those children, and yet how useless. In 1817 the society for their protection had the Prince of Wales as patron; the Duke of Bedford, Earl Grosvenor, Mr. William Wilberforce, Sir Francis Burdett, and a host of others as vice presidents. The Committee of the House of Commons, obtained by their efforts in that year, reported—

“Infants of the early age of four, five, and six years have been employed, it being the practice for parents to sell their children to this trade.”

The evidence went on—

“They are stolen from their parents and inveigled out of workhouses; that in order to conquer the natural repugnance of the infants to ascend the narrow and dangerous chimneys, blows are used; that pins are forced into their feet by the boy who follows up the chimney, in order to compel them to ascend it, and that lighted straw has been applied for that purpose; that the children are subject to sores, and bruises, and burns on their thighs, knees, and elbows; and that it will require many months before the extremities of the elbows and knees become sufficiently hard.”

Then after that statement, followed a long enumeration of the deformities, mutilations, cruelties, and diseases to which they were subjected, with the wretched moral and physical consequences; atrocious cases also of murder, treated as moderate manslaughter—and, to conclude, Richard Wright, a medical witness, stated the horrible character of the disease called “Chimney sweepers’ cancer,” which was confirmed by the eminent surgeon Mr. Cline, and before the Lords’ Committee in the same year by Mr. Vincent and Sir William Blizard. The same witness added a frightful catalogue of diseases and mutilations to which they were subject through ill-treatment. All this was confirmed and intensified by evidence before the Lords in 1818. This year, too, was signalized by a stirring and fearful article in The Edinburgh Review, in which the Rev. Sydney Smith recorded all the horrors of the trade, and left the public without the possibility of a plea of ignorance. Evidence was again taken in 1834, and in 1840 the Bill sent up by Mr. Fox Maule was referred to a Select Committee of their Lordships’ House. That evidence re-affirmed all the atrocities of the system, and satisfied the House of the necessity and safety of the proposed remedies. In 1853, also, much evidence was taken to show the violations of the Act. In 1864 we had the Report of a Royal Commission, which had been issued two years before, to inquire into the employment of children and young persons. To this evidence, as it was so recent, he would now call their Lordships’ attention. It must be, he feared, in many respects, a repetition of former statements; nevertheless the public and their Lordships might have forgotten them, and they would, he was sure, pardon the reproduction, for it was necessary, of evidence already given. Let them take first the ages at which they began to train up a child in the way he should go. It appeared from evidence taken in 1863 that the age at which training commenced was from six to eight, generally six—a “nice trainable age,” said the masters. There were instances of five, and even of four-and-a-half. The hours of work in the smaller towns were eight to nine; in the larger, from 12 to 16, work beginning at 4 o’clock, 3, and even 2 in the morning. 63 witnesses were examined from all parts of England, 33 of whom were master sweeps. Then followed the mode of doing it. Of the training, Mr. Ruff, of Nottingham, a master sweep, said—

“No one knows the cruelty which a boy has to undergo in learning. The flesh must be hardened. This must be done by rubbing it, chiefly on the elbows and knees, with the strongest brine, close by a hot fire. You must stand over them with a cane, or coax them by a promise of a halfpenny if they will stand a few more rubs. At first they will come back from their work streaming with blood, and the knees looking as if the caps had been pulled off. Then they must be rubbed with brine again.”

“The following description,” said the Commissioners, “is so painful, that we should hesitate to record it were it not amply confirmed:—‘If, as often happens,’ says a master sweep, ‘a boy is gloomy or sleepy, or anywise “lenty,” and you have other jobs on at the same time, though I should be as kind as I could, you must ill-treat him somehow, either with the hand or brush, or something. It is remembering the cruelty which I have suffered which makes me so strong against boys being employed. I have the marks of it on my body now, and I believe the biggest part of the sweeps in the town have the same. That (showing a deep scar across the bottom of the calf of the leg) was made by a blow from my master with an ash-plant—i.e., a young ash tree that is supple and will not break—when I was six years old; it was cut to the bone, which had to be scraped to heal the wound. I have marks of nailed boots, &c., on other parts.’”

Mr. Stransfield, another master sweep, said—

“In learning a child you must use violence. I shudder now when I think of it. I have gone to bed with my knees and elbows scabbed and raw, and the inside of my thighs all scarified."

Another said—

"At first they will come back from their work with their arms and knees streaming with blood, and the knees looking as if the caps had been pulled off. Then they must be rubbed with brine again, and perhaps go off at once to another chimney. In some boys I have heard that the flesh does not harden for years."

One of the Commissioners stated—

"I found a boy of about eight, in the market, who had run away from some place. Part of his knee-caps got torn off, the gristle all showed white, and the guilders (tendons) all around were like white string, or an imitation of white cotton. His back was covered with sores all the way up."

To harden his knees a lotion made of old "netting"—i.e., urine kept long for the purpose—simmered with hot cinders, was put on them. "It was like killing him," said the sweep, "and I had to stand by and see it all." "Why, I myself," says another—

"Have kept a lad four hours up a chimney, when he was so sore that he could scarcely move; but I would not let him come down till he had finished. It has often made my heart ache to hear them wail, even when I was what you may call a party to it. In learning a child," he goes on, "you can't be soft with him, you must use violence. I shudder now when I think of it."

There, then, their Lordships might see what was the elementary education that a Christian people gave to its children! Here came in another form of suffering and death. In some cases children, said the Report, had been—

"Seriously burnt in consequence of having been compelled by their masters to ascend flues on fire."

Mr. Michael Brown, Coroner for the borough of Nottingham, stated that he had held two inquests on climbing-boys; in one the fire was burning, and something was put over the still hot fireplace to enable the boy to rest his feet on at starting. According to Mr. Peacock, of Burslem, Mr. Herries, of Leicester, had collected 23 cases of boys who had been killed in chimnies by being stifled since 1840. Here was another form of suffering in the shape of a fearful disease—exactly as stated in 1817. Here came in some sanitary results. It was well known to surgeons that sweeps were liable to a peculiar disease—a most painful and fatal complaint, consisting of a peculiar form of cancer, arising from the exposure to soot. Among the men it was known as the "sooty wart," or "sooty cancer." One master said he had known eight or nine sweeps lose their lives by that disease. All that was confirmative of the evidence before Parliament in 1817 and 1818. And now, for the necessary result in their moral condition, take the language of the Commissioners—

"The concurrent testimony of all the witnesses proves that the climbing-boys are greatly neglected, and constitute, in fact, one of the most degraded classes of the community. The very nature of the employment itself, independently of bad treatment and neglect, tends to lower the character of those children; it is, in truth, unsuitable to a human being; and with all these painful facts before us we regard the moral debasement inseparable from the use of climbing-boys, as the worst effect of the violation of the law."

Then, in order to show the safe use of the machine, the Commissioners stated, on a calculation, that nearly two millions and a-half of flues in the metropolis were swept by it; and they concluded by adding—

"It is important to state, on evidence which cannot be controverted, that since the passing of the Act (1840), so far from fires caused by flues having increased in the metropolitan districts, they have proportionately diminished."

The Commissioners then quoted from a very instructive "Table," as they termed it, by Captain Shaw of the Fire-engine Establishment; and that had been confirmed by a note he (Lord Shaftesbury) had himself received from that excellent public servant—

"I consider," he wrote, "the system of climbing-boys most barbarous, and, from my special point of view, wholly unnecessary."

Now, he had given them but a sample of the atrocities perpetrated under this Satanic system. There were some far worse than those he had recorded; but the statement of them would be long, and he hoped unnecessary. What more could be required to produce conviction? But to show the needless cruelty and oppression of the system, he asked them to take these facts. He quoted the authority of architects and builders, who had in every stage, from 1773 to the present day, shown the safety and superiority of the machine, especially in the evidence of 1834 and 1840. Let them hear now the practical evidence, which was quite unanswerable. On London: Letter from Colonel Henderson to say that the inquiries of the police had not discovered a single climbing-boy in the whole metropolis with its four millions of inhabitants. Glasgow: Letter from the Chief Constable to declare the system utterly extinct. Edinburgh: Letter from the Lord Provost to the same effect. From Stirling, Dumfries, Perth, Aberdeen, Ayr, Leicester, the evidence before the Commissioners was the same. From Paris, Lord Lyons wrote, on an official statement—

"The modern construction of chimneys admits the passage of a brush or machine. There is no law against the use of climbing-boys; but in consequence of such construction that mode of sweeping is becoming more and more rare, especially in Paris."

New York: Letter from General Schenck, to whose kindness he was much indebted—

"Chimney-sweeps, climbing-boys, under twenty-one years of age, were many years ago employed in New York, and perhaps (though I think not) in some of the large American towns, but the practice has gone quite into disuse, and the work is now done altogether by brush or other machinery."

He (the Earl of Shaftesbury) was, indeed, charged, a few years ago, by the American journals, with cruelty and inconsistency, for reviling American slavery, and yet permitting the practice of climbing boys. How then, and why then, it might be asked, was the Act so inoperative? First, said the reporters, the neglect of the sections in the several Acts, regulating the construction of chimneys, and especially the disinclination of householders to incur the expense of introducing "soot holes," as prescribed by the Acts; second, the want of efficient machinery for putting the Acts into operation; third, the disinclination of magistrates to convict. A large proportion, they said, of the public connived at or directly encouraged the employment of climbing-boys. Those feelings, the Commissioners observed, were not confined to the lower ranks of society, but were shared by noblemen, magistrates, and other individuals. Again, the police, as a rule, did not appear to have interfered, the enforcement of the law not having been deemed by them to be part of their duty, and, as Mr. Batten—a barrister engaged for the purpose, who made inquiries in 1873—added, because they knew that it would not be agreeable to the authorities—authorities, such as those in the cities of Liverpool and Bath, where the law was openly and systematically broken. In some instances, they stated, proofs of the infringement of the law had been demanded by the magistrates, which it was difficult or impossible for the prosecutor to furnish. Their Lordships ought now to hear Mr. Michael Brown. This evidence, by reason of the position of the witness, was of singular importance—

"I am a solicitor," he stated, "and coroner for the borough of Nottingham. Another cause," said the witness, "which no doubt contributes to encourage the use of boys is that magistrates seem unwilling to convict on such a charge, knowing in some cases that boys are used in their own houses."

He went on to say—

"I was present at the hearing of a case a few miles from Nottingham. It was proved that the sweep entered with a boy, and that a brush, not a machine, was seen put out of the top of the chimney. The boy was present, and apparently not more than nine or ten years old, but the Bench required the informant to produce strict proof of his age, refusing to assume that he was under 21."

Let their Lordships consider that. A lad of 10 years old, and the magistrate demanding legal proof that he was under 21! A plain denial of justice.

"The sweep," continued the witness, "was acquitted. But the impression left upon my mind, and I believe on that of others in Court, was, that the magistrates were unwilling to convict if they could avoid it, and it was mentioned in the justice-room, as a fact, that the presiding magistrate had in his own house flues which would not admit of the use of the machine, and that boys were used instead."

"I am convinced," wrote Mr. Lord, one of the sub-commissioners, "that, in very many country districts, and in towns also, the occupiers both of private dwellings and of places of business, wink at the practice of sending boys up their chimneys. Two very estimable gentlemen, magistrates of their county, have said to me very significantly, 'We prefer not to ask how our chimneys are swept.'"

And that was the example of obedience to the laws set to the poorer sort by wealthy corporations, great Lords, and high magistrates! But here, in contrast to all that, he would quote something of a higher order. The Commissioners said—

"Can we do better, in conclusion, than to recite the forcible language of the late Lord Cockburn, when passing sentence on a man who had been convicted, in 1840, for employing a child, who lost his life in a chimney at Glasgow:—'It was not only a scandal to the law to allow the sweeping of chimneys by children, but it was a deep disgrace on society to perpetuate the trade, society being, in point of fact, art and part in the commission of the inhumanity.' Lord Cockburn proceeded—'It was, indeed, monstrous to allow any child to be employed in such a way, and if the trade was but once put down, it would be looked upon with so much horror that it would be difficult to convince the next generation that it had ever existed in a country claiming to be Christian.'"

But here came another, and a sad contrast. In the present year and in the year 1873 two cases of deaths by climbing were tried at Assizes—only two cases, no doubt, out of many—one of a boy killed at Cambridge, and another at Gateshead. In both cases the jury brought in verdicts of manslaughter. But no such sentiments as those expressed by Lord Cockburn were heard from the English Judges, and the inadequate sentence was inflicted in each case of six months' imprisonment with hard labour. It was not for him to talk about the administration of justice; but he had a right to say, and he did say, that he wished they had men like the Scotch Judges on their own judicial Bench. All he had stated had been confirmed by the testimony of Mr. Batten, a barrister, who gave last year his valuable services by travelling from place to place making inquiries and sending reports. He begged their Lordships to observe that he proposed no new law, but simply a mode of making the present one effectively. He simply proposed, according to the advice of the Commissioners, that no person should be allowed to carry on the trade of chimney-sweeper until he had received a licence for such from competent authority.

"Our assistant Commissioner, Mr. Longe," say they, "who has visited Glasgow, attaches great importance to this plan of licensing, and we are of opinion that it should be made a part of the duty of the police to carry the Act into operation."

The result, moreover, of many years' experience in Glasgow and Edinburgh proved the value of this regulation. It insured the observance of the law, and tended to raise the character of the mastersweeps, who wherever the machine was used, were always elevated in the scale of society. Such was the case that he had to lay before their Lordships, and it only remained for him to ask what argument could be assigned, what facts adduced, against the simple proposition he had submitted to their judgment? Might he in a few words recapitulate the grounds of his appeal? He had shown that for more than 100 years that horrible system had been known to the public; that no one could in honesty plead ignorance of it; that it had occupied the attention of individuals and of Parliament, who had endeavoured at various times and in various ways to restrict and suppress it. But the effect had only been partial. He had shown the long succession of disgusting and unsurpassed physical and moral cruelties which had been inflicted, and which were still being inflicted, on children of the tenderest years. He had shown that the law had been inoperative in many places—nay, had been wilfully and systematically disobeyed through the hostility of the magistrates, both unpaid and stipendiary, through the indifference of the public, and the obstinacy, recklessness, or parsimony of corporations and private gentlemen. He had shown that the humane and wise regulations for the construction of flues, enacted so early as 1834, had been, with very few exceptions, utterly disregarded; while the wretched children were still tormented under the plea of necessity, which necessity would be obviated by obedience to the law. He had shown the superior efficiency and safety of the machine. He had urged, and without possibility of refutation, that there existed not in the whole Kingdom a single flue which might not, with a trouble and cost unworthy of mention, be made sweepable by mechanical appliances. He had pressed on their Lordships' remembrance that among many of the millions of England, Scotland, and America the vile system was unknown, not that it was never known, but that being known it was banished as hateful and unnecessary. He had done what he could, and would their Lordships do the same? Surely they would now—he said it with all respect—they would, as a part of the Imperial Parliament, now emphatically declare that their laws were passed to be obeyed, and not to be systematically broken; that their beneficent statutes should not be set aside by high or low, rich or poor; and that, as all rule and authority came from above, they would exercise them in the spirit in which they had received them, the very least as feeling their care, and the greatest as not exempt from their power.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."
—(The Earl of Shaftesbury.)

EARL BEAUCHAMP said, he was sure their Lordships had listened with much interest to the very able statement of the noble Earl, for nobody was so competent to deal with the subject as the noble Earl. Everybody must admit it to be a disgrace that such a state of things should continue to exist; and, therefore, he was sure their Lordships would gladly give a second reading to the Bill, in order to show their anxiety to co-operate with the noble Earl in his endeavours to do away with the evils which he had so forcibly described. But would the measure, so ably advocated by the noble Earl, produce the good results he anticipated from it? On this, and former occasions, the noble Earl had expressed his opinion that the existing law was fully sufficient if put in force, and that the continuance of those evils was due to magistrates not enforcing the Act of Parliament—the real difficulty was to put the law in motion. Now, he must confess that, if this were so, and he had the noble Earl's word for it, he did not see how that evil was to be remedied by superadding to the existing law further provisions as to registration or licences, which magistrates would refrain from enforcing just as they did the present law. He thought that one effectual means for accomplishing what the noble Earl and all their Lordships desired was, by calling attention to the continued existence of this horrible scandal among us;—and that much would be effected by such speeches as that just delivered by the noble Earl. He believed that a speech which the noble Earl had delivered in their Lordships' House before Easter on the subject had done a great deal of good, and he ventured to anticipate that the speech he had delivered that evening would do still more. Another means was, by sending circulars to the police in various parts of the country, requiring a more stringent enforcement of the existing law—for he certainly did not see how the present Bill could operate to produce greater vigilance on the part of the police, or greater vigour on the part of the magistrates. Their Lordships must have heard with satisfaction the statement of the noble Earl, that in this great metropolis, and in other very large towns, the practice of sweeping chimneys by climbing boys was extinct. He thought that was no mean result to have followed from the exertions of the noble Earl, and those who worked with him, in this cause. For the reasons he had already stated, he did not expect much from the Bill—he thought much greater results would flow from the influence of public opinion—but he would vote with the noble Earl, and the Government would support the second reading.

LORD ABERDARE said, he did not differ very much from the noble Earl who had just spoken for the Government as to the results which might be expected from such appeals to public opinion as that made by the noble Earl who moved the second reading of this Bill; but, at the same time, the noble Earl had made so strong a case for the Bill, that he thought the House was bound to support him. He was disposed to think, however, that the noble Earl opposite (Earl Beauchamp) rather undervalued the probable effect of the system of licences proposed in the Bill. Licences had been enforced with good results in the case of other callings, and it might be expected that if chimney sweeps held a licence which could be revoked, they would be careful not to put in jeopardy their means of subsistence. He would suggest to the noble Earl who had charge of the Bill, whether the magistrates in Sessions would not be the best persons to issue the licences.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON was understood to suggest that it should be made obligatory on persons employing sweeps to see that the latter held licences under the Bill.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that the two great obstacles to the practical enforcement of the law were the indisposition of the magistrates to convict, and, consequently, of the police to act. Now, seeing what a large portion of the cost of the police of the country was paid out of the Imperial funds, the Government might put a pressure on the police to act against offending chimney sweepers, regardless of the feelings of magistrates, in at least bringing the cases before magistrates. He had very little fear but that the pressure of opinion which was sure to result from the harrowing statement made by the noble Earl who had charge of the Bill (the Earl of Shaftesbury) would compel magistrates to act when cases in which they ought to do so were brought before them.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly.

ARTIZANS DWELLINGS BILL.

(The Lord Steward.)

(NO. 82.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

EARL BEAUCHAMP, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that though the practice had begun to prevail of constructing Bills without Preambles, yet the principles of the present measure would be found in the Preamble, the various propositions of which could scarcely be questioned. None of their Lordships would deny that—

“Various portions of many cities and boroughs were so built, and the buildings thereon were so densely inhabited, as to be highly injurious to the moral and physical welfare of the inhabitants;”

nor would any of their Lordships refuse their sanction to the further proposition that it was—

“Necessary for the public health that many houses, courts, and alleys should be pulled down and such portions of the said cities and boroughs be reconstructed.”

Having thus glanced at the Preamble, he thought it might be convenient if, in the first place, he went through the enacting portions of the Bill for the purpose of simply stating what it proposed. Clause 1 was merely a provision for giving a short title to the Act. Clause 2 described the districts to which the Act was to apply and the Local Authorities in those districts. It was to apply to the City of London and the Metropolis exclusive of the City of London; urban sanitary districts in England containing a population of 25,000 and upwards; and urban sanitary districts in Ireland containing a similar population. The “local authority” was to be as respecting the City of London the Commissioners of Sewers, as respected the Metropolis outside the City, the Metropolitan Board of Works, and in each urban sanitary district the urban sanitary authority of that district. He had the curiosity to ascertain the number of persons to whom the Act would apply exclusive of the inhabitants of the Metropolis and those of the City of London, and he found that it would apply to 5,400,000 souls. Their Lordships would see, therefore, that immense numbers of people would be affected by the provisions of the Bill now before them. Clause 3 provided that the Local Authority might make a scheme for improvement on being satisfied by an “official representation” of the unhealthiness of the district. Clause 4 provided that the “official representation” might be made by the medical officer of health of his own motion, or on the complaint of two justices of the peace, or of 12 ratepayers. Clause 5 described the requisites in the shape of maps, estimates, and particulars which should accompany the improvement scheme of a Local Authority. The Local Authority was to be invested with discretion as to the locality in which new dwellings were to be provided, and was not to be compelled to provide them within the area of demolition. One part of Clause 5 assumed increased importance when read in connection with Clause 8, which empowered the Local Authority to contract with the limited owner who was under restrictions as to his tenure. Another valuable portion of the Bill was that which diminished the costs of Parliamentary proceedings by employing the machinery of Provisional Orders. As to the execution of the scheme by the Local Authority—the Local Authority was, immediately on the scheme having received the confirmation of Parliament, to take steps for purchasing the land required, and for otherwise carrying out the scheme—they might sell or let any part of the land so purchased upon terms that would carry the scheme into execution; or they might engage with any companies or other bodies, to carry out the scheme upon such terms as they, the Local Authority, might think expedient; but they were not, without the express sanction of the confirming authority, to undertake themselves the execution of any part of the scheme—that was left to commercial or other enterprise. Hitherto it had been found by those who had directed special attention to the subject that the impediment to progress was the difficulty of acquiring sites and not the difficulty of providing funds; for some of the 16 associations or Companies of the Metropolis possessed more money than they had been able to devote to the objects for which they were formed. The Bill would not run counter to the principles of political economy, because interference with the inexorable laws of political economy must ultimately bring about much wider misery than would be temporarily caused by the existence of those hard cases which, according to the proverb, produced bad law. The Bill left to private enterprize that which was no part of the business of either the State or the Local Authorities. Where, under the protection of the law, complicated tenures had grown up, it was no interference with the laws of political economy for the State to solve difficulties created by its own artificial action. The Bill was not a compulsory measure, and for the best of all reasons—if a Local Authority was really determined to do nothing, it would be difficult to coerce it by means of a Central Authority. He was unwilling to believe that the great municipal corporations of this country would, when called upon to deal with this subject, show such a want of public spirit as to allow such plague spots to remain within their jurisdiction as were proposed to be removed by this Bill. On this point he would refer their Lordships to what had been done by the Corporation of Liverpool in 1864, by the City of Glasgow in 1866, and by the City of Edinburgh in 1867 under their Improvement and Sanitary Acts. In Glasgow in one single improvement not fewer than 250 families were removed and found ready accommodation in the immediate neighbourhood. The information on the Table of the House as to what had been done by the three great municipal bodies of this country to which he had referred, showed that they were not insensible of the duties which were imposed on them, and that a large portion of the remaining municipalities would gladly accept the opportunity of putting into operation the machinery placed at their disposal by this Bill. The real difficulty with which they had to deal was not the density of the population, for while in the most dense part of London the average density was 235 per acre, and the actual density of the densest part of London was 410 human beings per acre, yet the number accommodated in some of the improved areas were not less than 1,100 souls per acre. The real evil was the unsuitability of the tenements. The problem was complex, the remedy simple. By an economic use of the space obtained, and the erection of more suitable dwellings, they might hope a very large area would remain for playgrounds for children, or for squares, or, what was not less important in a sanitary point of view, for wide streets. At all events, there was no reason to fear that a very large space would not be available for housing the dispossessed population. London was not like Paris where the population was not indigenous but continually recruited from the country. In 1871, there were living in London of persons born there 2,055,576, so that their Lordships would see the importance of providing adequate condition of sanitary propriety for the rearing of the large number of children born in London; while for the whole of England and Wales the decennial increase of the rural population—1861-71—was 668,428, the increase of the urban population was 1,969,456. Parliament had not been forgetful of its duty in this respect, and from time to time various Acts had been passed dealing with the subject. He had before him a list of the Acts which had been passed; but up to the present time no comprehensive scheme of this kind had been initiated. One argument which was often used against the demolition of these houses was that it often drove the population into a worse state of things than before; but the detailed experience of Glasgow and Edinburgh gave a very different result. In fact, the working classes were always ready to avail themselves of the improved dwellings which were placed within their reach. Some valuable information had recently been placed on the Table with reference to the diminution of crime coincident with the improved dwellings of the lower classes. In Glasgow, in 1867, when the Improvement Trust commenced, the number of crimes reported was 10,899; whereas there had been, not a casual or sudden, but a continuous decrease, till in 1873 the number of crimes reported was only 7,869. Then, as to mortality. He had figures before him which showed the difference in this respect between two streets of Liverpool, one of which was properly ventilated and provided with sewers, and the other in a very defective sanitary condition. It appeared that while in the one street out of 100 children under one year only four died, no fewer than 50 died in the other. Again, whereas in the whole metropolitan area the ordinary death rate was 24 per 1,000, the death rate in the houses of the Metropolitan Associations for Providing Dwellings might be taken at 14.

Their Lordships would see in these figures how large a margin was left for improvement. It was useless to suppose that in providing suburban accommodation for the labouring classes they would find an adequate remedy for the evils complained of. It was essential to a large class of artizans that they should reside near their work. It was not only that time was lost if they lived in the suburbs—not only that they were separated all day from their families—but it was in many cases indispensable that the artizans should be always at hand; and therefore it was impossible that suburban dwellings should ever provide accommodation for that description of artizans. He hoped their Lordships would be of opinion that the time was come when a serious effort should be made in this matter. We had not only to make up for the neglect of the past, but to meet the growing demands of the future—for the population was increasing at an enormous rate, and it was estimated that between the years 1870 and 1880 no less than 3,000,000 souls would be added to the subjects of Her Majesty within these islands, of whom three-fourths would be deserters in towns. He had studiously refrained from drawing a sensational picture of the sufferings and horrors undergone in consequence of overcrowding. He appealed to their reason and justice. It must be remembered that we were no longer living under the conditions of a sparse and scattered population as in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and that we must do what we could to retrieve past errors as well as to make provision for the future. He trusted that if this Bill, the second reading of which he now begged to move, were passed, a great deal would be done to regain for the toiling millions whom it would affect their due share of health and happiness and of life.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2."—(The Lord Steward.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY*: My Lords, Her Majesty's Government deserve our praise and gratitude for the Bill they have introduced. I admire the boldness and perseverance with which they have addressed themselves to this difficult question. They have done their best to master the difficulty; but they have not mastered it; nor will they do so, until after wide and protracted experience. The Bill, on a broad view of it, may be divided into two parts—demolition and re-construction. It may be, though the matter is doubtful, that the part affecting demolition is complete; I will assume, however, that it is so; but the more intricate part remains—and they will find that to cover with houses the large spaces, that shall have been laid bare, houses adapted in number and quality to the wants of the displaced population, will put their scheme very severely to the test. I cannot but think that the Government are over sanguine in their forecast of what will be effected by the Bill. It may ultimately produce great good; but the working of it will demand much thought and patience. It is true that there are very large areas in which great benefit will result to the community from the mere removal of the houses which now encumber them; but when they are removed, what is to be substituted? Now, look to the effects of demolition. Hundreds, indeed thousands, of families will be displaced; some for a time until the tenements shall have been re-built; but many permanently. Such was the case in the Westminster improvements—and for the population so disturbed provision must be made. It is stated, I know, in the Bill, that arrangements of this sort must accompany demolition; but the requirements of a clause and the fulfilment of those requirements are very different things, and oftentimes separated by a long interval. It is vain to rely on the ample notice that is to be given to the inhabitants. They do not, and they really cannot, give heed to it. Occupied, as they are, day by day and hour by hour, they think only of the present; and they cannot afford time or loss of wage to run about in quest of other dwellings. And so when the moment arrives for the levelling of the domiciles in which they reside, they are like persons possessed—perplexity and dismay are everywhere; the district has all the air of a town taken by assault. Then they rush into every hole where they can be received; some near, some very far off; though all struggle to be as close as possible to their former dwellings. Streets and houses, already overcrowded, become doubled in population. Every demand of health and decency is set aside; and people submit, by compulsion, to the greatest moral and physical degradation. I need not multiply instances, though I could well do so. But all that I have stated was seen when New Oxford Street was constructed, and the St. Giles's rookeries destroyed; the masses in Church Lane—a district already seething with life—were, in consequence, increased two-fold. And in Westminster, to make room for Victoria Street and other handsome improvements, a nation of men, women, and children was driven out; many of the old ones went into the workhouse, and never escaped from it; many fled across the water, suffering great privations, until they had formed new connections of work; and many pressed into the swarming rooms of the neighbourhood, the landlord, in numberless instances, where the poor inhabitants had two rooms, taking from them one, and then forcing them to pay for the single as much as they had paid for the double apartment. Now, I would not have spoken on the present occasion had not the subject before us been one on which I have been engaged ever since 1843; one to which I have devoted a great deal of time and attention; and yet I am no nearer the solution of the problem than when I began it. I mention all this to show the necessity of much care and circumspection in your preliminary operations. My noble Friend has said, and very truly, that the labourer must in many cases reside near his work. That is exactly the point I am insisting on. It is so, even with several classes of the skilled artizans. Take, for example, the watchmakers of Clerkenwell. They must live near together, because, as no one of them is rich enough to possess a complete set of tools for his minute and delicate business, they borrow of each other; a mutual service that could not be rendered were they far apart. And I concur again with my noble Friend that suburban dwellings will not give the full remedy we seek—they will furnish but a part of it—nevertheless, if taste and preference lie that way, these tastes should be encouraged. But now, my Lords, let us think of re-construction—we must not, on commencing so vast a work, rely on what is ordinarily called philanthropy. It must be a commercial enterprize; and with that view we must have recourse to the building capitalists. Now such experience as I have leads me to believe that few of them would undertake a work like that with less than a fair prospect of 10 per cent on the outlay. But here the promoters and the contractors will be at variance. The promoters will of course desire accommodation for the classes temporarily displaced; but the contractors will seek to erect houses which will bear the highest rent by being adapted to the richer order of skilled artizans. At once, then, will arise the difficulty. The large proportion of the labouring people in the metropolis are not of the skilled class, but of the inferior order of labourers who live by casual and irregular duty, without any definite or constant employment, and, consequently, unable to afford sufficient house-room for themselves and their families. Here is a sample, and a sample only, from the Report of the Charity Organization Society on the dwellings of this class—

“In St. Giles's, about 3,000 families have only one room, exclusive of about 2,000 persons living in common lodging-houses; and in Holborn, out of a population of 44,809 persons, about 8,000 families are in single rooms.”

I may just, in passing, show the sanitary results of such things.

“The average mortality,” the Report adds, “in the worst streets in St. Giles's varies from about 40 to 60 per 1,000 persons living, and that in the worst parts of Whitechapel averages 40 per 1,000, while that of all London for the year 1872 was only 21·4.”

Now, must we not infer from this statement that if two parishes alone present such a mass, the whole aggregate of London must present something almost intolerable? And yet these are the classes for which you are to provide sufficient and proper abodes. My noble Friend has said that the experiment has already been tried in Glasgow, and with success. He says that some 250 families were removed, and that they found ample accommodation in the immediate neighbourhood. Now, in the first place, I remember a saying of Mr. Canning's, that “nothing was so fallacious as figures, except facts;” but I must also observe that an experiment made on 250 families is widely different from one to be made on some thousands; and we must also ask what was the precise class of the parties removed, and we must consider, moreover, the distinctive peculiarities of the Scotch and English character. But when my noble Friend makes his calculations as to the possibility of erecting cheap tenements for the poorer sort, he must remember that the cost of buildings already erected and the rent put upon them do not furnish a proof that similar results may be attained in the present day. The price of material is higher than it was; and the rate of wages in the building trade is so advanced, that, in order to make a remunerative profit, a much heavier weekly payment must be imposed on the occupier of apartments, whether they be constructed on the separate or the block system. Well, what are we to do? Are we to construct a vast number of single rooms in order to meet the means of these poor people, or are we to build houses according to our new sanitary requirements? If we re-construct single rooms we shall maintain a most indecent and most immoral state of things; if, on the other hand, we do not, rents will be raised so high that it will be perfectly impossible for the people to bear the demands that will be made upon them. I am speaking now of labourers who have no regular work of any kind, and not of skilled artizans. These men live from hand to mouth, and have to take work as it comes, just at the moment. At the docks, for instance, men may be seen standing in single file, 40 or 50 deep. There they remain for hours in the hope of getting work; and were they not on the spot they would stand no chance of being employed. The earnings of these men, whose employment is dependent on the wind and the arrival of the ships, are extremely small. When there is plenty of work they make about 17s. a-week, but taking the average throughout the year their earnings in the aggregate do not exceed 9s. 9d. a-week. Then, as to their abodes; some single rooms are let for 2s. 6d. and 3s. 6d. a-week, but there are some of these people who pay as much as 4s. 6d. a-week for a single apartment. You must remember, too, that although the wages of skilled artizans and those who have fixed labour have risen very considerably, the earnings of the class I have been alluding to have not perceptibly increased, owing partly to the nature of the work and partly to the great influx of people from the country every year. Now I must repeat that, unless we re-construct dwellings adapted to their means, great injury will be inflicted on the people who are displaced. Yet there is one form of remedy well worthy of consideration. We can adapt, drain, and ventilate old tenements, courts, alleys, and culs-de-sac at a far less outlay than is required to construct anything new. The Society with which I am connected—the Labourers' Friend Society—has made, and successfully made, such efforts on a pretty large scale. We began it some years ago; and since that time the plan has been pursued, and with very good results, by an energetic lady, Miss Octavia Hill. Let me show your Lordships some of the happy results. Take, for instance, Tyndall's Buildings, in Gray's Inn Road. We got possession of this court, and renovated it at a cost of £2,699 19s. 11d. Well, on an average of seven years, from 1864 to 1870, the return has been 5½ per cent. It contains 87 rooms for families; and your Lordships will bear in mind that the inhabitants are of the poorest class of labourers, mostly Irish, who cannot afford to pay more than from 1s. up to 2s. for their week's lodging. This court I had long coveted, for it was filthy, miserable, and disorderly beyond all precedent. Fever was never absent; and I can answer, from personal inspection, that I, at least, have not descriptive power enough to say what it was physically and morally. Nevertheless, we had courage for the work, and the issue had better be stated in the words of two authorities of some value in the district. The medical officer reported that fever was now unknown in that locality; and the police-constable, who for a long time had been acquainted with the wretched place, assured me that while formerly the police always went down the court by couples, they had now seldom occasion to go there at all. Similar statements may be made in respect of Wild Court, near Drury Lane. It contains 100 rooms for families, which families are also mostly Irish. It was renovated at an outlay of £3,364 19s. 11d., with an average percentage of 4½. I may add, without going into details, the like results have been obtained in Clarke's Buildings, in St. Giles's-in-the-fields. Now, I venture to suggest this plan—it is, unquestionably, worthy of consideration, as a partial, not as a complete, remedy. Surely, in every area where there is to be a wide demolition, some of the best buildings might be reserved for improvements and adaptation, the only mode whereby we shall be able, at least so far as we know at present, to better the domiciliary condition of the great bulk of the labouring classes. But whatever be the determination of higher powers, I will venture to express a hope that all will be done with care, circumspection, and, above all, not in haste. If the clearances be gradual, it will be far more easy to make provision, temporary or permanent, for those who are driven out. I have been much among the people in such circumstances; and I know what they suffer; and I know, too, how they bear it. I have often heard the language of complaint and sorrow, but never of sedition or revenge. The law thus carried into effect may, by God's blessing, do much good; and my noble Friend may take this assurance to his heart—His brevibus principiis via sternitur ad majora.

LORD ABERDARE, in supporting the Bill, said, the noble Earl had referred to the vigorous way in which Liverpool and Glasgow had grappled with the evils of bad house accommodation, and he (Lord Aberdare) asked why similar improvements should not be effected in London? The Bill, no doubt, placed the responsibility on the Local Authorities of the various districts—but if these were competent to perform these functions, why should not London, which possessed such large powers of self-government, be able to effect as much as Glasgow? He believed that since 1870 upwards of 3,000 miserable dwellings, containing 15,000 more miserable inhabitants, had been pulled down in Glasgow, and within the same time a sufficient number of new houses built to accommodate the working classes, as well as to meet the increase of the general population. The noble Lord who introduced the Bill (Earl Beauchamp) had touched but slightly on the diminution of the crime in connection with this subject; but the noble Earl did not refer to the improvement in the health and morals which must result from these alterations. He (Lord Aberdare) believed that a very great diminution of crime would result from such improvements as were contemplated by this Bill. Since the improvements made in house accommodation in Glasgow the number of crimes there had decreased from 10,899 to 7,869. That was an answer to the argument that the pulling down of miserable dwellings occupied by the poor would propagate evil and spread it over a larger area. He thought that power should be given by the Bill to exchange land occupied by bad dwellings for other land wherever such change would be to the interest of a locality. He cordially supported the principle of the Bill.

LORD NAPIER AND ETTRICK said, there was no greater obstacle to the health, the purity, the culture, and vigour of the labouring population than the bad condition of the dwellings in which many of that class lived—he believed it would be found that the morality of a population was on a par with the condition of their dwellings. Her Majesty's Government had therefore in every respect done a wise and useful thing in introducing the present measure to Parliament, and they had done so without the impulsion of any agitation; but solely for the object which recommended itself to their consideration—the necessity of improving the dwellings of the working classes and the poor. The necessity for such a Bill had been long advocated by persons who were identified with questions of the kind, but it was a matter which the Government of the day might have allowed to hang over for an indefinite period; and, as it dealt with questions of property, and was therefore a matter of some delicacy, there was a strong temptation to let it drift. And it was certainly a little remarkable that the class which was to be most benefited by the Bill had shown so little interest in it. Having given his opinion as to the value of the measure, he thought he was justified in making some criticism upon its main features—namely, the ground on which it proceeded, the agencies it employed, and the powers it conferred upon them. The ground on which it proceeded was that it was absolutely necessary, not only upon sanitary but upon moral grounds, that some such measure should be passed; but he regretted to say that having just mentioned the word “moral” in the Preamble the Bill made no further mention of it. There were in many of the large cities and towns localities which were the resorts of the vicious and criminal classes, and which ought on that ground to be swept away, but which, being perfectly healthy, could not be touched under the provisions of the Bill.

With regard to the agencies which were to be employed in carrying out the provisions of the Bill, he found that the proposals were various. In the case of the metropolis, Petitions for the confirmation of schemes were to be presented to a Secretary of State, but the Petitions of urban sanitary authorities were to be dealt with by the Local Government Board. On the whole, he thought it would be better if the Local Government Board had been chosen as the confirming authority in London as well as in the provinces. Before this Bill was introduced, local authorities possessed power to demolish insanitary property, but not to make a useful appropriation of the site, and the exercise of that power in some cases would have intensified the evil it was intended to mitigate. This Bill gave all the necessary supplementary powers with which a public body could properly be intrusted. But what he objected to was that after a scheme had been made by the Local Authority, and after that scheme had been confirmed by the confirming Authority named in the Bill, it was quite optional on the part of the Local Authority to take proceedings or not towards removing buildings. This could not be for fear of investing the confirming Authority with arbitrary power, because at present if a Local Authority neglected its duty, the Local Government Board could coerce or do what was necessary and raise the money by rating the locality. Why, then, should the superior Authority be left so impotent in this case? It ought to submit a report to the Local Authority for its remarks, and if the Local Authority failed to satisfy the confirming Authority, that ought to be invested with power to order a scheme to be carried out. The hardship would be far less in this case than in reference to water supply and drainage, because in those cases it was an administrative Authority that overrode an elective authority, while in this case nothing could be done without the sanction of Parliament. The Bill also provided that there should be a distinction made with regard to London and the country; and that while in London the Home Secretary was to be the confirming Authority, with respect to provincial towns it was to be the Local Government Board. He did not see any reason for putting the metropolis into a different position from that of any other town, and he thought the distinction was an invidious one. Nothing could exceed the extent of the powers now given to Local Authorities, either under application for private Bills or for public works. Unfortunately, while they had these extensive powers, they were inert and refused to act. He thought that it would be wise in the Government to amend the Bill in one respect. At present the Local Authority would only have power to make a report, which might be acted upon or not; but, in his opinion, they ought to be required, in the event of the confirmation of their report, to carry it into execution. He did not think the apprehensions of the noble Earl (the Earl of Shaftesbury) as to capital always requiring the incentive of 10 or 15 per cent were at all well founded, for experience had shown that companies and associations had no difficulty in attracting capital, the owners of which were satisfied with 4 or 5 per cent. The three principal building companies in London paid 4½, 3, and 5 per cent respectively. The Peabody Trust did not pay more than 3½, but it was conducted on charitable rather than commercial principles; and, if the property were to be sold by auction, it would probably sell to realize 4 or 5 per cent. In a country in which capital accumulated so rapidly, it would be better that it should be employed in these undertakings than that it should be squandered, as it lately had been, upon foreign loans.

Motion agreed to ; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday the 3rd of June next.

REGIMENTAL EXCHANGES BILL.

(NO. 44.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD SANDHURST: My Lords, in consequence of what I have heard since I made some remarks in this House on Friday evening, I find that a misapprehension exists in the public mind in regard to the intention of those remarks, and I am anxious to make a short explanation. In the first place, it is said that I was making an attack on the administration of the Army; and, in the second place, it is said that I had reflected on the honour of some of the officers of the Army. I am happy that these circumstances have been brought to my notice, because I am able to refute in the most direct manner both imputations. In the first place, with regard to the administration of the Army, what I said was this—that it appeared to me to be inconsistent with security that the execution of a very important measure should rest on the responsibility of one individual, and that it should be declared that solely according to the opinion of that individual we should be guided in estimating what might be the state of the Army hereafter. I illustrated my point by referring to the administration of the Army when it was conducted by the Duke of Wellington, and it appeared to me that if abuses arose under the administration of such authority as that—for the practice of the Army under that administration was analogous to the practice introduced by the Bill about to become law—I do say that the illustration I used was sufficient for my point, while at the same time it shows how very far it was from my mind to attack the administration of the Army. What was the illustration? It was this—When I was a young man, in 1844, my regiment was ordered to India. Under these circumstances, exchanges were very freely permitted under the orders of the Duke of Wellington. The other night I spoke from memory; but I have since exactly verified the facts, and I find that on that occasion four new captains joined the regiment under the process of exchange, and five subaltern officers. I think there was a sixth, but owing to the promotions in the regiment, I do not exactly remember. That appears to me to be a great number of exchanges, and the effect on the regiment, as I stated, was very serious. What were the circumstances of the country and of the Army at that period? In July and August, 1844, it was deemed necessary by the Government of this country, at the requisition of the Government of India, to send three battalions of Infantry to re-inforce the Army of India. In those days three battalions, numbering upwards of 3,000 men, was a very large re-inforcement of the British Army in India. What was the reason? The reason was, that Maharajah Runjeet Singh had lately died, there was a mutiny in his army, our frontier was threatened, and there was danger of war. Therefore, the Army was re-inforced. But the circumstances were not known to the public—and I beg your Lordships' attention to this. Although, of course, present to the minds of the authorities, they were not known to the regimental officers, who embarked completely according to the rights and privileges offered them and consistently with the rules of the Army as understood in those days—a system bearing a very close analogy to what will be introduced by this Bill. When I stated these facts, I beg your Lordships to understand that there was no reflection, direct or indirect—no insinuation against the honour of those gentlemen with whom it was my great privilege to be associated in early life, and the survivors of whom are among my dearest friends. I will, therefore, take this opportunity of asking the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond) not to consider that he has a monopoly of regard for the honour of the officers of the British Army. Let me beg of him to recollect that there are others who feel as keenly as he does in this matter, and old officer as I am—having served, with a very brief interval of time passed in diplomatic employment, during 40 years—I venture to think that the honour of the Army, the honour of its officers, and the discipline of its regiments, are at least as dear to me as to the noble Duke opposite. We on this side have sought to introduce improvements into the system of the Army; I do not wish to exaggerate their importance, but I am confident we have appealed to a higher motive—we have sought to inculcate the principle of duty, while perhaps we have disregarded that of private interest; but at least it cannot be said that we have been regardless of the honour and interests of the Army.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: My Lords, as the noble Lord has alluded so directly to me, your Lordships will, I am sure, allow me to make a very few remarks after what has fallen from him. The noble Lord takes me to task in a manner which would lead your Lordships to believe that I assumed the monopoly of regard for the honour of the Army. My Lords, I have never attempted to monopolize such a feeling or to say that I had a right to do so; but in common with your Lordships, I have a right to feel very keenly for everything connected with the Army. I have every right to have a strong feeling of regard for the Army, for my own father fought and bled with the Duke of Wellington: my grandfather, also, was engaged in the Battle of Waterloo, and I have many relatives and intimate friends in various ranks and grades of the Army. Therefore, I say I have a perfect right to feel keenly everything that is said about the Army; and because the other evening the noble Lord made remarks in connection with the Army, and the officers of the Army, which I did not think altogether well-founded, I took the liberty of asking him the question which I am extremely glad I put to him, because it has enabled him to give your Lordships the version he has now offered of the meaning of the remarks which he made on that occasion. I will venture to remind him of what he said; and I think your Lordships will see that, at all events, the mode in which he addressed the House on that occasion was such as might give rise to the impression among those who heard him that he spoke in no very respectful terms of the particular regiment in which he was a captain. I accept his explanation to-night, that he did not intend to say anything disrespectful of his own regiment; but, with your Lordships' permission, I will read the very few words which fell from him the other night. He stated that on the occasion to which he referred very great inconvenience arose from the system of exchanges. He said—

"When he was a young man, a captain in a Line regiment, what happened? It was a time when the saying was 'That officers must either sell or sail.' . . . At the very time they were about to sail, 10 young officers walked into the harbour in the place of 10 officers who exchanged—four captains and six subalterns."—[3 Hansard, cccxiv. 252.]

He said—

"Their Lordships might judge of the disorganization which existed in that regiment for many months afterwards. That occurred under the great Duke of Wellington. He was talking of the year 1844, when war was threatening in India. The regiment to which he belonged, within a few months after its landing, found itself in the presence of the enemy—those 10 officers had actually exchanged from a regiment which, in a brief period, was engaged on the frontiers of India."—[Ibid.]

What the noble Lord has said now is that these officers profited by the system of exchanges which was permitted, and that none of them had any notion they would be brought very shortly after their arrival in India in face of the enemy. He says it was well known that this system of exchanges had demoralized the regiment. But if those officers in England could not know anything that was likely to happen in India, then the system of exchanges could not be complained of; and if it had demoralized the regiment, I think the noble Lord will admit the demoralization lasted but a very short period, and that by the time they got to India there was very little demoralization left, if we may judge from what occurred in that regiment at that time. The noble Lord talked as if we were then in a state of warfare in India. It was not so. In the beginning of 1844 Lord Ellenborough was recalled; and the father of my noble Friend the noble Viscount (Viscount Hardinge) behind me went out in June. It was not for 19 months afterwards that there was anything like an engagement with the enemy.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE: In the summer of 1845 the first battle was fought.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND: That was in consequence of an aggression from the Sikhs. The noble Lord may contradict me if he is able; but I do not think there is anything in the history of that time which would indicate that we were then under the impression that we were likely to be engaged in warfare. What, then, do the noble Lord's remarks come to? To this—that in 1844, when there was no war imminent in India—when, in point of fact, war did not break out until 19 months afterwards, when there is nothing in history to show that the authorities of this country had the smallest idea that they were to be engaged in war—10 officers exchanged out of the regiment in a legitimate manner—for the noble Lord says so to-night—their places were filled by others, and the regiment went to India. And the noble Lord has not adduced an instance of another regiment going to India in which the same thing occurred. It can, therefore, be only a very exceptional case in which such a number of officers did exchange at that period. Now, what would have happened if the arrangements of the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cardwell) had then been in existence? Exactly the same thing might have happened. Supposing the arrangements of the noble Viscount to have been in operation in 1844, what was there to prevent the officers from exchanging? No doubt, the number was exceptional. I think such a thing is not likely to happen under the present system and the present régime, and therefore I hold that the noble Lord laid a great foundation for the view which was taken of his remarks—not only in this House, but by persons out-of-doors, who, probably, spoke to him on the subject. But after having dealt with this particular case—and I may be permitted to say that in doing so he spoke in very disparaging terms of military men in general—the noble Lord went on to say—

“He was only too well able to confirm what had been stated so emphatically by Lord Clyde when he deplored the facilities given to officers to exchange when they were in dangerous foreign climates. If there was one thing which destroyed discipline more than another, it was when a regiment was on a distant frontier, when perhaps every third man was down, and when officers left their men to sicken while they sought healthier or more comfortable quarters. Were not such officers open to the same imputation as though they were actually guilty of misconduct?”—[Ibid.]

I say that is a libel on the officers of the Army. And what did the noble Lord go on to say? That “he did not mean to say that such things occurred.” Well, then, if he did not, he had much better not have mentioned them; because, if they do not occur, his words mean nothing; and, if they do occur, I maintain that the noble Lord is bound to prove what I call a libel on the British Army. My Lords, I am sorry I have been obliged to trouble you on this subject; but having been so pointedly alluded to—the noble Lord having spoken of my claiming the monopoly of supporting the honour of the Army—I felt called upon to make these observations. I shall say no more at present except this—that I do not think the noble Lord’s remarks on that occasion were such as I should have expected from a General Officer on full pay and holding a very high command.

EARL GRANVILLE: I rise for the purpose of expressing a hope that it may not be necessary to prolong this discussion. If the noble Lord (Lord Sandhurst) found that the impression had got abroad that he had attacked the honour of the officers and the present administration of the Army under the illustrious Duke, he had a right to take the first opportunity of clearing himself of that imputation, and, as a gallant and distinguished Officer, of disclaiming any intention of that character. I do not deny that the noble Duke had a right to reply to the imputation which he supposed had been made of claiming a monopoly of defending the honour of the British Army. But what I believe to be the case is this—we are all equally alive to the honour of the British Army, and that it is perfectly possible, while discussing those passing changes which relate to the discipline and future of the Army, to use arguments to show that one change is more beneficial than another for that discipline and that future, without exposing oneself to the slightest imputation of implying that feelings of dishonour influence the British Army, and without casting upon it one word of censure.

Bill reported, without amendment; and to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

House adjourned at half past Eight o’clock, to Thursday next, Twelve o’clock.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS—CITY OF NORWICH.

MR. SPEAKER informed the House, that he had received from Mr. Justice Lush, one of the Judges on the rota for the Trial of Election Petitions, a Certificate and Report relating to the Election for the City of Norwich. And the same were read.

METROPOLIS—MUSICAL PERFORMANCES ON GOOD FRIDAY—THE LORD CHAMBERLAIN’S LICENCES.

QUESTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department,

Whether his attention has been called to the prohibition by the Lord Chamberlain of the performance of sacred music in the theatres on Good Friday last; whether he can state to the House the reasons for this change in practice; and, whether the Government propose to take any steps, by legislation or otherwise, to prevent in future such interference with the enjoyments of the people?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, the Lord Chamberlain's power with respect to performances of any kind, whether secular or sacred, on Good Fridays were defined by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, and the licences for music were granted by the Justices under 25 Geo. II. c. 36. The Lord Chamberlain had made no change whatever in practice with regard to the issue of licences for stage plays. The following days had always been excepted from such licences:—Ash Wednesday, Good Friday, Christmas Day, and Sundays. On these days theatres were unlicensed houses, and no performances for hire could lawfully be given within them, nor could the Lord Chamberlain grant a licence for performances in theatres on those days. If at any time there had been such performances, they had been given without his sanction or assent. There was no necessity for any fresh legislation for licensing music-halls and concert-rooms for the performance of music, as the magistrates had the power, if they thought fit to exercise it, excepting on Sundays.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR: Do the Government intend to take any step in the matter?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: No.

ADULTERATION OF FOOD ACT— ADULTERATION OF BEER.—QUESTION.

MR. STAVELEY HILL asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to a case before a stipendiary magistrate at Stoke upon Trent, of a charge against a publican of selling beer adulterated with salt, in which it seems to have been taken for granted that the allowance for the presence of salt in beer of any strength is limited to fifty grains per imperial gallon; and, whether there is any such limit at present in force, either by statute or otherwise?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, there was a Schedule to the Act of 1872 which expressly stated that salt was an article of adulteration when used in beer. By the Act of 1874 that Schedule was abolished, and now the question of adulteration, even with salt, came under the general law with reference to the adulteration of drink and food. There was no statutory or judicial interpretation as to the quantity of salt which would necessarily adulterate beer. One of his predecessors in office was in communication some time ago with the Inland Revenue on the subject, and his decision seemed to have been this:—He wrote to the Inland Revenue stating that where the amount of salt in beer did not exceed a fixed quantity—say 50 grains per gallon—the Inland Revenue need not inquire whether such quantity had or had not been artificially added. In the case referred to, he was informed by the magistrates that the London analyst had found the quantity of salt used in the beer to have been 136 grains per gallon.

RAILWAY PASSENGER DUTY. QUESTION.

MR. RODWELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he can inform the House as to the amount he expects to receive, during the present financial year, from the Railway Passenger Duty?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: £700,000, Sir.

COUNCIL OF MEDICAL EDUCATION— MEDICAL DIPLOMAS.—QUESTION.

MR. WADDY asked the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, If the Government has any information from the Medical Council of the success of attempts on the part of the medical examining bodies in the three divisions of the kingdom to form conjoint boards for giving diplomas that shall constitute a complete qualification in all branches of the medical art; and, if the Government, in the event of its not receiving or of not having yet received satisfactory information, is likely to bring in a Bill, or otherwise initiate legislation, with a view to remedy the present system of half-qualifications by nineteen competing bodies?

VISCOUNT SANDON: Sir, we have no official information from the Medical Council on the subject of the hon. Gentleman's Question; but I have reason to believe that attempts are still being made to form conjoint Boards for giving diplomas that shall constitute a complete qualification in all branches of medical art. How far these attempts may be successful we cannot yet say; but I may point to the Society of Apothecaries Act of last Session, and to the Bill respecting the College of Surgeons now before the House, as proofs that the matter is not being left alone by the medical bodies. The attention of Government has only quite recently been called to this subject, which is a very large and complicated one. I am not prepared, therefore, at present to state the views of Her Majesty's Government respecting further legislation.

GERMANY AND FRANCE.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: By a printer's error the Question I am about to ask is not on the Paper. I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he is in a position to make any re-assuring statement to the House with reference to the recent alarm as to the relations of France and Germany?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I may take the opportunity of stating that I have just now laid upon the Table of the House the Correspondence that has passed between the Governments of Germany and Belgium. In answer to the Question of the hon. Baronet, I am happy to say that Her Majesty's Government has this morning received from Berlin assurances of a thoroughly satisfactory character, and we are of opinion that there is no further cause for apprehension as to the maintenance of European peace.

SALMON FISHERY ACT, 1873— THE SEVERN DISTRICT.

QUESTION.

MR. CLIVE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether two inquiries at the public cost into the Bye-laws of the Severn District have been granted, and what other similar inquiries have been held at the public cost; whether an inquiry into the Bye-laws of the Wye District, made in 1874, was refused at the public cost; whether any inquiry has been held into the Wye Bye-laws, and what has been the result; whether he will lay upon the Table Copies of the Correspondence which has passed between the Home Office and the Conservators of the Wye District; and, of the Reports of the Inspectors of Salmon Fisheries relating to the Wye Bye-laws?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that there had been two inquiries at the public cost—the first related to the size of the mesh to be used in fishing with nets; the second as to the use of nets for other fish than salmon. There had also been an inquiry in 1873, before the passing of the Fishery Act, at the public expense, and in the preceding year there had been a public inquiry into the general question. As to the Correspondence, he had no objection to lay a Copy of it on the Table, except that it happened to be very bulky, and he could not consent to produce only part of the Correspondence. He would lay the whole of it on the Table if the hon. Member moved for it.

MR. CLIVE said, in that case he should move for the whole of the Correspondence on the subject.

ARMY—ADJUTANTS OF MILITIA.

QUESTION.

MR. HEYGATE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether, in the event of an Adjutant of Militia signifying his intention of retiring before the 1st of October 1875, such retirement would be carried out at once; or, would he be permitted to remain, provided the brigade dépôt was not formed, and he was recommended by his commanding officer and the Colonel of the Brigade Dépôt to be retained until the dépôt was formed.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that under the circumstances stated the adjutant would not be permitted to remain until the brigade dépôt was formed, but his retirement would be carried out as soon as his successor could be conveniently appointed. Perhaps he might be permitted to explain a statement he had made yesterday in reply to the hon. and gallant Member for South Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander), the purport of which appeared to have been somewhat misapprehended. The hon.

and gallant Member had asked him whether adjutants of Militia regiments who decline to avail themselves of the new retirement scheme would be required, as the alternative, to perform the duties of adjutants to brigade depôts at the head-quarters of the sub-district? To that Question he had replied that the adjutants of Militia who declined to avail themselves of the new retirement scheme would be required to perform all military duty the same as other officers belonging to the brigade depôt, and that the appointment of adjutants to a brigade depôt did not exist under present regulations.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE CONVICT CASTRO OR ORTON.—QUESTION.

MR. WHALLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to a letter in the "Morning Advertiser" of the 10th instant, purporting to come from the Tichborne Claimant, and stating that he was suffering from insufficiency of food and otherwise, and had been unable to get requisite food and medicine, Whether he has received any report from the authorities at Dartmoor as to the state of this convict; and, if so, whether he will inform the House thereon, and whether he will institute inquiry as to the statements contained in the said letter? The hon. Gentleman said, with the permission of the House he would read the letter to which he referred. ["No, no!"] He would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair whether he should not be in Order in reading the letter, the substance of which he had not set forth so fully in his Question as was desirable. He could vouch for the authenticity of the letter, from which he would only read such extracts as would render his Question intelligible.

MR. SPEAKER: The reading of the letter cannot be necessary to make the Question of the hon. Member intelligible or to elicit the information he requires.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I have seen the letter which purports to have come from the prisoner Thomas Castro, or whatever name the hon. Member chooses to designate him by, but my information is to the following effect:—The prisoner has fallen off considerably in weight since his conviction. This was naturally to be expected. The medical officer at Dartmoor states that the prisoner's weight is now of a healthy standard for a man of his frame, although the reduction in weight had occurred somewhat too rapidly. The prisoner on the directors' last visit complained of mental and bodily suffering from the cold, but he made no complaint of insufficiency of food. The medical officer reported that he was now watching him carefully, but did not make any immediate recommendation. In case he does so his report will receive attention. There is no restriction whatever as to the supply of the medicine and food the medical officer thinks necessary to prescribe. The only recommendation the medical officer has made is in regard to a slight change in diet, and the prisoner has also been ordered rather more outdoor exercise than the other prisoners.

INDIA—BRITISH BURMA AND WESTERN CHINA.—QUESTION.

MR. SAMPSON LLOYD asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House Copies of all Correspondence respecting Trade between British Burma and Western China since 17th February 1873, between the Secretary of State for India and the Governor General of India, between the latter and the Chief Commissioner and Political Agent of British Burma, between the said Chief Commissioner and his Agents at Mandalay and Bhamo, between [the Mandalay Agent and the Government of Burma, and between the Governor General of India and Her Majesty's Minister at Peking (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, "Rangoon and Western China," No. 258, of Session 1873)?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON, in reply, said, that he proposed shortly to lay upon the Table Papers giving the reason for the despatch of the expedition from British Burma to Western China, and also giving an account of the attack made upon the party. He thought that the Papers would include nearly all the Correspondence to which the hon. Member alluded.

THE JURY SYSTEM OF IRELAND—LEGISLATION.—QUESTION.

SIR ARTHUR GUINNESS asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If it is his intention to introduce a Bill for the improvement of the Jury System of Ireland during this Session; and, if so, at what date?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, he was fully aware of the necessity for legislation upon this subject. For some months past a Bill had been drafted which was intended to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee of last Session, and he had hoped to have introduced it before Easter. It had, however, occurred to him that it would not be advisable to place the Bill upon the Table without some prospect of a fair chance of proceeding with it. He had also felt that one important measure for Ireland at a time was enough. He still hoped to introduce the Bill during the present Session; but, looking at the state of Public Business and of the Notice Paper, his hope was not so sanguine on the point as it had been. Whether the greater question was or was not dealt with, it would be necessary to pass a short Bill similar to that of last Session, for the purpose of continuing for another year the existing Law on the subject.

ALKALI ACT, 1863—INSPECTION OF CHEMICAL WORKS, IRELAND.

QUESTION.

SIR ARTHUR GUINNESS asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, Whether the Local Government Boards for Ireland, under the Act of last Session, intend to appoint a Special Inspector for the four Chemical Works in Ireland, independent of the Inspectors at present acting under the Alkali Act, 1863?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, in reply, said, that looking at the small number of chemical works in Ireland, there appeared to be no necessity for appointing special Inspectors for them.

PARLIAMENT—ARRANGEMENT OF PUBLIC BUSINESS.—QUESTION.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I think it would be for the convenience of hon. Members if the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister would inform the House what Business will be taken on Thursday. In the hope that the original intention of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the holidays may be fulfilled—namely, that they should extend from Thursday next to the Thursday in next week—I beg to ask, what will be the Business that will be taken on the day that the House re-assembles after the holidays?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, what we propose is that on Thursday we should continue the Sale of Food and Drugs Bill in Committee, if it is not finished, which I trust it will be; and then we propose to proceed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Bills relating to the National Debt, the Savings Banks, and the Inland Revenue. If there should be time to do so, we also propose to go into Committee on the Friendly Societies Bill. When we meet on Thursday week we intend to go into Supply.

DEFINITION OF BOUNDARIES—SALMON FISHERIES (IRELAND) ACT. QUESTION.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary for Ireland, If he will explain to the House upon what principle the Fishery Commissioners in Ireland have acted in defining the mouths of rivers, with respect to the right of putting out nets for the purpose of catching salmon; and whether the principle is the same in all the salmon fisheries in Ireland?

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: Sir, by the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 92 the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries are empowered, subject to the approval of the Lord Lieutenant and the Privy Council, to define or re-define the boundaries of the mouths of rivers, if after local inquiry they are satisfied of the expediency or necessity of such action. The principles on which they have acted in carrying out this power have had regard in all cases to the physical circumstances of the locality, without respect to the right of putting out nets for the capture of salmon.

PARLIAMENT—THE DERBY DAY—ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE.

QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I beg, Sir, to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Minister of the Crown a Question, of which I have given him no Notice, but which probably he will be prepared to answer at once. It is, Whether it is his intention on this day fortnight to move that this House adjourn over the Derby Day?

MR. DISRAELI: Really, I must consider this subject.

Sir Arthur Guinness

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND)

BILL.—[BILL 154.]

(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Sir Michael Hicks-Beach.)

MR. BUTT said, he rose to move that the Bill be read a third time on that day six months. It was not his intention, at that stage of the Bill, to enter with any minuteness into the subject; but he felt it his duty to make that Motion, and to take a division upon it, by way of protest on his own part and on that of many Irish Members around him. Not only did they believe it to be unnecessary, but they objected to the form in which it was ultimately passing, continuing, as it did, for five years, powers over which the House would have no control during that period. The Bill, also, would outlive the House itself—a fact which, in his view, constituted a dangerous precedent. The continuing of the power of imprisonment for more than one year, whilst the writ of Habeas Corpus was suspended, was in itself a power so dangerous that he felt it his duty to divide the House upon the question before it, not with any expectation that he should be able to maintain a majority in favour of his Amendment, but with the intention of placing on record the protest of opponents.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Butt.)

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that all that had been urged by the majority of the Irish Members had not been wasted upon him; but he had felt it his duty to vote for the Bill on every occasion, and for this reason—that the majority of the Members for Ireland had, for a series of years, expressed an opinion that Ireland was not to be governed upon the same principles as the rest of the United Kingdom. They had demanded the disestablishment of the Protestant Church in Ireland. They had expressed extreme satisfaction at the establishment of a different code of laws for land tenure for Ireland, as distinguished from the landlord and tenant law which prevailed in England and Scotland, and they had appeared in that House as the representatives of an organization which distinctly intended to establish a system of Home Government in Ireland, different from that which prevailed in other parts of the United Kingdom. When the majority of the Representatives of one section of the Kingdom expressed a firm determination not to be governed according to the laws which prevailed in the other sections, he considered that the Legislature of the United Kingdom was justified in establishing a different system of Government for that section, according to the best judgment of the House, and the requirements of the case.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOOK said, he did not mean to reply to the remarks of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, but he had risen for the purpose of directing the attention of the House to the danger of passing a Bill of this kind. The offences against which it was directed were not specifically named or described in it; so much so that he ventured to say there were not 10 Members of the House who understood the Bill. It was, in fact, only to be understood by the careful study of several other Acts of Parliament—of no fewer than 12 other Acts—which were referred to in the first part of the Bill alone; but the reference to those Acts afforded to the readers of the Bill now before the House no information either as to the offences they created or the penalties they imposed. This absence of information on the face of the Bill was the more objectionable, as the penalties enacted by the Bill were for the most part directed against the lower and more ignorant classes; but it would in every case be necessary in order to understand the Bill, to refer to the statutes of which he had made mention, no information concerning whose provisions was contained in the Bill itself. In fact, those Acts had to be carefully read by everyone who desired to know what the present Bill meant. Though himself a lawyer of some years' standing, he did not profess to recollect what was contained in those Acts; and if it was possible that persons in his position should not know the law, it was only fair that the Bill should give the information which all were supposed to have who had to obey the law. To do that might give rise to a little more trouble in drafting the Bill; but that was no reason why the Bill should not give full information as to the acts which might constitute offences against it and their consequences. The omission of which he had spoken had grown into a practice, and if it was persisted in—if previous enactments were to be embodied in Bills by simply stating the titles of the Acts which contained them—great public inconvenience must arise. Bills might be made a little longer by their being fully set out; and Her Majesty's Government might perhaps congratulate themselves on the rapidity with which they had got through this Bill; it had, in fact only occupied three weeks in Committee; but the discussions would not be greatly lengthened in consequence of adopting his suggestion, and all whom the law concerned would exactly know what it was.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, he hoped the House would bear with him whilst he made a few remarks on the Bill; for though he was an Irish Member, he had as yet taken no part in the long discussions into which it had led them, and if he remained altogether silent upon it, his silence might be misapprehended. Having given his support to the Government on this Bill, he thought it only fair to his constituents that he should state the grounds upon which he had given that support, on all points of the Bill excepting one only, on which he had voted against the Government—that which gave the Government the power of keeping a man in prison for more than 12 months without his being brought to trial. He claimed this indulgence from his hon. Friends opposite, because he had before now proved that he was no friend to Coercion Bills. He had before now voted against their continued operation for more than 12 months; and last Session he declined to vote for including the Coercion Act in the Continuance Bill, on the ground that the House had had no authoritative statement from Her Majesty's Government as to the grounds upon which they desired the continuance of the statutes objected to. Who, indeed, he would ask, could be a friend to a Coercion Bill, except under the dire necessity of the case? None of them liked to have to go back to their constituencies and tell them that they had taken part in passing a Coercion Bill. It would not be a pleasant duty even for an English Member; and he claimed for the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government that he had not, throughout his whole career, shown himself in any way a friend of legislation of this kind. Finding these Acts, the work of his predecessors, on the Statute Book, he had felt it his duty to do that which the circumstances appeared to demand and to warrant; but in doing so the Government had entirely separated themselves from a policy of mere continuance. They had endeavoured, in the interests of personal liberty, to see what previous enactments of the kind they might dispense with, and, in the interests of order, to see what it was absolutely necessary for them to retain and to re-enact. It was well that that should be stated, in order that it might be understood in Ireland that the Bill had not been conceived in any spirit of hostility, or of undue repression, but that the most liberal and patriotic judgment had been exercised upon it. ["Oh!"] He would remind the House that in the Bill two of the most important provisions to be found on this subject in the Statute Book had been dispensed with—the Press Clauses and the "Curfew" Clause—the power of arresting suspicious persons at night. The power of search warrant lasting for three months had been cut down to the reasonable period of 21 days; the arbitrary power of the Lord Lieutenant to close public-houses without assigning any reason had been destroyed; the power of the police to arrest strangers in a proclaimed district had been entirely destroyed; and the absolute power given to the Attorney General to change the venue in criminal cases had been destroyed. Now, he would appeal to those who had formed hasty and censorious judgments upon this Bill, whether the Government were not entitled to the credit he claimed, and whether they were at all justified in describing this Bill as the perpetuation of a brutal and bloody code? The whole conduct of the Government in reference to the Bill was the best answer that could be made to such a charge. Every suggestion of amendment, no matter how hostile the source, received in the course of the debate the most careful attention from the Chief Secretary and the Solicitor General for Ireland. In Committee the Government had also made various material concessions, among which were these—Licences must now be granted by resident magistrates on the certificate of two justices; night domiciliary visits had been prevented; a warrant to search for arms must be executed in the presence of the responsible person to whom it was addressed; a restriction had been placed on the period of imprisonment on summary convictions, while hard labour in the case of those summary convictions had been done away with; and, last and most important concession of all, the right of having the writ of Habeas Corpus had been restored. It must, however, be understood, that these concessions had been made by the Government in no spirit of weakness or of vacillation. They had been fully debated and considered with fairness and candour, and the Government had shown their desire, while making the law a terror to evildoers, not to place any unnecessary inconvenience or restriction on the liberty of the subject. He had been struck with one observation which had been made by the hon. and learned Serjeant who had just sat down, and he thought the hon. and learned Member must have been joking when he made it. The hon. and learned Gentleman referred to the limited extent of the discussions on this Bill. Now, he was under the impression that this was the 12th sitting of the House upon which the Bill had been discussed for hours together. He himself believed that there never was a discussion before which had been carried on so long without any attempt to restrict it. No attempt had been made to restrict the discussion on this Bill, in the smallest degree, or the extent to which the opposition was designed to go. No sort of impediment had been thrown in the way of fair and impartial consideration of every Amendment which had been placed before the House, even though the same Amendments had been repeated two or three times. At the same time, he did not hesitate to say he would have preferred to see two other alterations made in the Bill. He thought it an unfortunate circumstance that they should have to continue this Bill for a period of five years, and would much prefer that it should have been continued for only three years; but when asked to support its continuance for two years he felt that he could not conscientiously vote for a repetition of these discussions in so short a time. He believed, however, that many of the provisions of this Bill might be left with the greatest possible safety and satisfaction in the hands of the present Lord Lieutenant. The Duke of Abercorn was an Irishman, above all other things desiring the prosperity and welfare of the country; and he (Mr. Lewis) was sure he would not continue a proclamation a month longer than he believed to be necessary under his sense of duty, or by the requirements of public order. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, also, from the sympathy and cordiality with which he had entered into unquestioned Irish grievances, and the care with which he had attended to Irish measures, had entitled himself to the consideration and good feeling of his opponents. It was, undoubtedly, an embarrassing subject, and he had received from his constituents letters complaining of their being placed under these oppressive laws. Like good citizens, however, they had resolved to submit themselves to them, and to surrender their individual freedom, in the belief that the sacrifice was needed for the welfare of the State.

MR. MOORE said, he thought that not more time than was necessary had been consumed in the discussion of a Bill which was to suspend for five years the constitutional liberties of the subject. He remembered that for a long time last year they were marched and counter-marched through the Lobbies of the House on the clauses of the English Liquor Bill, and he did not believe that any honest, intelligent Englishman would grudge them an opportunity of expressing their views. The Prime Minister said, on the second reading of the Bill, that it was a measure of necessity framed in a spirit of conciliation. Why then did he ask to renew it for a period of unprecedented length? Nothing could show more clearly the increased confidence felt by all portions of the community, than the fabulous sums of money the farmers were willing to invest in land. A few years ago a farm of 50 acres, let at £3 an acre, was sold, and its occupation value obtained £1,500, or £30 an acre. Two years ago, another farm, 54 acres in extent, rented at 50s. an acre, obtained for its occupation value on being sold £2,500, or £46 an acre. In another instance last year, 7½ Irish acres on a lease, of which 15 years remained, were sold for £540, or £77 per acre. It was in the face of facts like these that the Government asked the House to renew a Bill of this kind for a period of unprecedented length. He hoped that some better reason would be given for re-enacting this measure for a period of five years than the mere stifling discussion or avoidance of an unpleasant subject. He should certainly oppose the third reading of the Bill.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN said, he did not rise for the purpose of following the hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. C. Lewis) into the various topics upon which he had addressed the House, but rather for the purpose of calling the attention of the Government to certain points in the Bill which seemed to him to require notice. He would, in the first place, observe that there were many places in Ireland where two magistrates did not attend petty sessions. Without wishing to introduce sectarian considerations into the debate, he might further remark that in his own part of the country, though the large mass of the people were of the Catholic persuasion, to which he also himself belonged, they held opinions contrary to those of the magistrates. In the course of the debate many observations had been made on the Irish resident magistracy, and he should ill perform his functions as Member for an Irish county if he did not testify how much the Irish people owed to their resident magistrates for their administration of the law. For the satisfactory fulfilment of the duties of a magistrate it was absolutely necessary that such an officer should have a thorough knowledge of the habits of the people, and even of their wants and their thoughts; and the generally satisfactory administration of the law in Ireland was highly creditable to the magistracy of that country.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU said, he had listened with some astonishment to the speech of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate). To use a French phrase, he thought he might say of him, "Il a perdu une belle occasion de se taire." If the hon. Gentleman had not spoken, he would not have supposed he had such poor reasons for the course which he said he had taken in reference to the Bill. Those who had taken part in opposing the Bill had done so, because they believed it necessary to defend their constituents from a system of legislation which was certainly different from that which the House passed for England and Scotland. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire told them again, that they had concurred in passing the Disestablishment Bill. Those who passed that Bill, however, were the great Liberal Party, then in a majority, who bowed to the demands of the Irish people. Another charge that the hon. Member had brought against them was, that they desired that the Irish people should legislate for themselves. Why, that ought rather to be a cause of thankfulness to the hon. Member. Both parties alike ought to rejoice at being relieved from the necessity of bowing to the demands of Irish Representatives, and from a tyranny which he deemed so grievous. But in regard to the general policy of the Bill and the Ministry by which it was promoted, he had a large fish at the end of his line and he wished to play it a little. The noble Lord then read an extract from a speech of the Prime Minister, who speaking of the Coercion Bill of 1846, stated that in less than a century there had been no fewer than 17 Coercion Acts for Ireland, which might lead some persons to doubt whether violent legislation always proved efficacious; the Prime Minister further said that Bills of that description should always be accompanied by remedial measures, to redress the evils out of which the necessity had arisen, and that Ireland ought to be governed as nearly as possible on the same principles as England. In this case he must call on the right hon. Gentleman to be true to his own policy. He not only did not bring in any remedial measures himself, but helped to prevent the passing of others which Irish Members brought in for the benefit of Ireland, and his Government strangled the Municipal Corporation (Ireland) Bill. He exonerated the right hon. Gentleman himself—he believed he hated Coercive Bills as much as anyone in that House, for nobody on the eve of the late General Election could have spoken more strongly, more violently, or even more ferociously, against such Bills; but he regretted to say that while the right hon. Gentleman had been silent and courteous throughout the progress of the present measure, the only argument he had advanced to prove the existence of Ribbonism was, that those who believed in it ought to regale themselves by drinking dry champagne.

MR. BUTLER-JOHNSTONE defended the remarks of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), and said, that while others pretended to be ashamed of belonging to a nation which suspended the securities for personal liberty, he, for his part, should feel ashamed of belonging to a country in which men were shot down in the high road by ruffians with blackened faces who hid behind hedges, and then scampered away in safety, and he should feel still more so were he to live under a Government so weak and pusillanimous as to refuse to take steps to put an end to so monstrous a state of things. He believed if the hon. Gentlemen opposite, below the Gangway, had a Parliament of their own on College Green, it could not exist for a week or a day without passing a measure every bit as severe as that under discussion, in order to maintain the indispensable and primary condition of all Governments—safety to life and property. The noble Lord (Lord Robert Montagu) had complained of the introduction of coercive measures without remedial measures; but he seemed to have forgotten that nearly the whole of last Session was spent in the consideration of remedial measures, and if Parliament had shrunk from granting Home Rule, it was only because it was averse to the dismemberment of the Empire.

MR. RONAYNE said, it was perfectly true what the hon. Gentleman had just stated, that if there were an Irish Parliament in College Green, it would itself enact coercive measures if proved to be necessary, but under the English Government coercion was the normal state of things in Ireland. And it should be borne in mind that while a child might accept correction at the hands of its own parents, it resented being chastised by a neighbour. The whole history of Ireland showed that her people had never yet obtained a single concession except by disaffection and sedition. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Gentlemen who knew nothing about the history of Ireland might cry "Oh, oh;" but he challenged them—as he had often challenged them before—to point out a single concession which had been granted to Ireland during the last 100 years that had not been granted from the apprehension of an outburst of civil war or from some Imperial necessity. The people of Ireland had never obtained a single concession until the echoes of the guns in the Revolutionary War in America were heard here. Again, in 1792, when they asked for justice, the Relief Bill was thrown under the Table of the House; but no sooner was the declaration of war made by the French Directory in 1793 than all that was asked was at once conceded. In fact, he challenged them to go through the whole catalogue of concessions and point out one of them which had not been wrung from the fears of England or Imperial necessity. What had they now done? They had re-cast an Act which handed over the government of Ireland to the police, to the county magistrates, whom the Government itself did not trust, and to that cloaca maxima, the Castle of Dublin. In fact, the Irish people were deprived of their liberties by corruption and by force, and he did not at all wonder at the support given to this measure by the late Chief Secretary for Ireland, for the noble Lord was then the Leader of a Party—a party of Constabulary, who indulged themselves in illegally breaking the skulls of the Queen's loyal subjects, holding a legal meeting in the Phoenix Park, and no doubt he appreciated the law that would allow him to do so with impunity. The Royal Irish Constabulary, however, were not a police, but a military force. They were very useful in rural districts where beaus were scarce, and they were excellent hands at organizing archery and cricket matches. They were toasted, too, at public dinners, after the Army and Navy, and he had suggested to many of his friends in the Army and Navy who drank this toast that an equally deserving force with which many of them were more familiarly acquainted, the sheriffs bailiffs, should be similarly toasted. Government did not trust the Irish magistrates, and the Irish magistrates did not trust the Government.

MR. WADDY expressed an earnest hope that the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) would not insist on a division. He thought it would be a most melancholy thing for the House to divide on the present occasion, especially after the speech of the hon. Member who had just preceded him—a speech which he had, with great sorrow, to submit would do more harm than all the concessions of the Government would do good. That speech forced him to admit that we could not dispense with Coercion Bills in a country of which even the intelligent, benevolent, and educated men could be found capable of making use of language so wild and violent. Every clause, he might say every word, of the Bill had been debated, and the Irish Members had had full scope in bringing forward their Amendments, which he did not hesitate to believe were sincere. But there could be no doubt as to what the result of a division would be, and he thought it would conduce to the existence of good feeling between Ireland and England if matters were not pushed to that extremity. It was a very undesirable thing to give a factious opposition to the third reading of the Bill. [Murmurs.] A division now would, he maintained, be regarded by the country as a flag of defiance rather than as a honourable expression of opposition to the Bill, and it would compel hon. Members who, like himself, had assisted the Irish Members to go into the Lobby against them.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, that, as he recognized in the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Waddy) a friend to the Irish people, he had listened with great attention to the observations he had made. The only question at issue with the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Roynane) was upon a matter of historical accuracy, and he had yet to learn in what particular it was violated by his hon. Friend. It was certainly true that the Duke of Wellington, when Prime Minister, in introducing the Roman Catholic Emancipation Bill, asked the House of Lords to pass that Bill in order to avert a threatened civil war in Ireland. Was it not also a fact that another Prime Minister, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), stated when canvassing Lancashire, that his attention had been drawn to the grievances and oppressions of Ireland by the intensity of Fenianism. The hon. Member opposite (Mr. Butler-Johnstone) had defended this Bill on the ground of the facility with which landlords were shot behind hedges in Ireland. The hon. Member evidently thought that it was the rule in Ireland to watch for landlords and to shoot them behind hedges. Now, he contended that was not the rule in Ireland. It had been sufficiently established during these discussions, and had been, indeed, admitted by the Government, that no language of that kind could accurately describe the present state of Ireland. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government would not turn a deaf ear to the appeal made to him by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Robert Montagu), and that he would remember his declaration that a coercive measure for Ireland ought to be followed by remedial measures. Several opportunities would arise in the course of the Session—as, for example, upon the further discussion of the Bill relating to compulsory sobriety in Ireland, the reclamation of waste lands, &c.—when the right hon. Gentleman could act up to the spirit of this declaration. He made this appeal to the right hon. Gentleman with the more confidence because he had introduced for the first time a Coercion Bill, the provisions of which would remain in force for a period of five years.

MR. JOHN GEORGE MACCARTHY said, that as the Irish Members would probably be outvoted in the division, he would respectfully but earnestly appeal to Her Majesty's Government to make the measure as little injurious and obnoxious to the feelings of the people as possible. He would also say for himself and others who acted with him, that they would endeavour, each in their several spheres, to reduce as much as possible the discontent and dissatisfaction which they knew would arise from a measure forced upon Ireland in spite of the opposition of its Members. He trusted that a Coercion Bill would not be the only message and gift sent to Ireland by Her Majesty's Ministers.

The House divided:—Ayes 287; Noes 70: Majority 217.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

LORD ROBERT MONTAGU: I believe that an alteration is necessary in the title of the Bill, and I move to insert, after the word "Ireland," the words, "and to grant an indemnity in certain cases."

Mr. Waddy

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH did not consider the words necessary, but would not object to their insertion in the title, as they could not do harm.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.
[New Title.]

BISHOPRIC OF SAINT ALBANS BILL.
(Mr. Assheton Cross, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwin-Ibbetson.)

[BILL 95.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.—(Mr. Assheton Cross.)

MR. RICHARD, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said: Sir, I wish, at the outset of the observations I intend to address to the House, to refer to an objection which may probably, and not unnaturally, have occurred to the minds of many hon. Gentlemen on seeing the Amendment I am about to move standing in my name. It may be thought that, as a Nonconformist, I have no right to meddle in a matter that relates to the internal organization and government of the Church of England. But then, unfortunately, in the eye of the law, we are all members of the Church of England, whether we like it or no, and cannot shake ourselves free from that relation and the obligations it involves. Besides which, we must remember that Parliament is the supreme Governing Body of the Church of England, and we, upon whom this high function devolves, are bound to fulfil it according to the best exercise we can of our judgment and conscience. I acknowledge the anomaly. I confess that it appears to me a flagrant absurdity, that a Body constituted as this House is—and it cannot be otherwise constituted, if it is to be a fair representation of the people of this country—a House consisting of members of the Church of Rome, of the Greek Church, of Presbyterians of various denominations, of Independents, Baptists, Wesleyan and Calvinistic Methodists, members of the Society of Friends, Unitarians, Jews, and I know not how many other forms of religious faith or no faith, should have committed to it the duty of regulating everything pertaining to the faith and practice, to the doctrine, discipline and worship of a Protestant Episcopal Church. With my conception of what a Christian Church is or ought to be, this is a condition of things which is to me inexpressibly painful and deplorable. And I have no doubt that there are many thoughtful and earnest members of the Church of England in this House who are deeply distressed by it, and would gladly, if they could, find some way of escape. I remember the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. G. Hardy) some years ago, under the pressure of this difficulty, suggesting that the Roman Catholic and Nonconformist Members of the House might be asked to abstain from taking any part in discussing and voting on questions connected with the Church of England. But that, of course, was only a momentary thought, extorted by the sense of embarrassment which he felt, for the right hon. Gentleman could not have seriously meant that we should divide ourselves in this House into sections or large Committees, according to our religious belief, for in that case we should claim reciprocity. If Roman Catholics and Nonconformists are to abstain from taking part in discussing and deciding Church of England questions, then the members of the Church of England must in like manner abstain from interfering in questions affecting the rights and interests of Roman Catholics and Nonconformists. I remember, also, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone), on the same or a similar occasion, saying that ecclesiastical legislation has become very difficult in this House, and that it may become impossible. But all this is inevitable so long as we have the Church connected with the State. For, as Bishop Warburton says—

Such being the case, what can we do when matters of this kind are thrust upon us—for thrust upon us they are—without any will of our own? I can say, with all sincerity, that it is no pleasure to me to have to discuss questions of this nature in this House; because I feel it is very difficult to do so without wounding the susceptibilities of hon. Gentlemen, whose conscientious convictions differing from mine, I wish to treat with honour and respect, and between whom and myself there are, I have no doubt, many points of sympathy on matters of far greater importance than those pertaining to ecclesiastical polity and organization. I wish to say, that in opposing this Bill I have no special antipathy to Bishops. I may not look upon them in the same light as many hon. Members of this House probably do. I do not believe that diocesan Episcopacy was any part of primitive Christianity, but rather an excrescence that has grown upon it since. Neither do I believe—though I am far from wishing to treat with ridicule, or disrespect those who do—in those mystic spiritual powers which Bishops are supposed to possess, and to be able to communicate to others. Still, as Pope says—

There are many Bishops of the Church of England whose names and memories I hold in as deep veneration as anyone in this House. The names of such men as Hooper and Latimer, of Leighton and Usher, of Taylor and Beveridge, or Berkeley and Butler, and many others who, by their saintly lives, or their admirable writings, have rendered inestimable service to the cause of Christianity in this land. But I object to this Bill, because it asks this House to concur in perpetuating and extending the creation of a class of politico-ecclesiastical State officials, whose existence, in my opinion, is not to the advantage of either Church or State. That an Episcopal Church should have Bishops, and have them in sufficient number to meet all its requirements, is a position so obvious that it admits of no doubt, and needs no argument. And, perhaps, nothing more shows the utterly crippled and helpless condition of the Church of England, than the fact that, though it has been in existence for upwards of 300 years, it has made only one addition to its Episcopate in the whole of that time. Compare this with the state of things in the United States of America. There is an Episcopal Church in that country—and a vigorous and flourishing Episcopal Church—of which the venerable Dr. Pusey says that—“Severed from the protection of the State, it first struck root when it was deprived of all human support, and long ago it quadrupled, while the population doubled only.”

In 1830, the number of dioceses in the United States was only 12. Now it is 41, besides 9 missionary Bishops, the sphere of whose operations is also, I believe, in their native country; while, as I have already said, with one exception, no addition has been made to the number of English Bishops for more than 300 years. Why is this difference? The reason is perfectly simple. One is a free Church, and can expand and adapt itself to the growth of population and the changing circumstances of the times; while the other is a Church in bondage to the State; and in this—as in a hundred other matters, is “cabbined, cribbed, confined” by that relation. I have been told by some hon. Members since my Notice has appeared on the Paper, that this is only an act of the Episcopal Church to extend and perfect its own organization. If it had been that, not one word would have fallen from my lips in opposition to it. But it is as far as possible from being that. In fact, the Church has nothing to do with it. It has no part or lot in this matter. It has no voice in the new adjustment of dioceses, no voice in the re-distribution of patronage, no voice in the election of the new Bishop. The new Bishop will be a State official, and although not sitting for the present in the House of Lords, he will have the right to do so in rotation, and that gives a political character to the appointment, which will, no doubt, be influenced—as most such appointments are—by political motives. For, how are Bishops appointed? Of course, by the Prime Minister, and very generally for political reasons. One of the Ecclesiastical journals says—

“A Bishop is a mere nominee of the Crown or Prime Minister: comes to his flock as a governor appointed over them without their concurrence or consent. What amount of cordial sympathy can be expected to exist between pastor or people in this state of mutual relationship? The pastor, only too naturally, fails to feel any responsibility towards those who have not reposed their confidence in him by choosing him as their leader and guide, or even by consenting to his appointment. But he does feel—and the less fervent his piety the more keenly does he feel—a sense of the responsibility towards the power that did nominate him for consecration. Hence we ever find, with rare and noble exceptions, Bishops siding with the Crown or Parliament against the real spiritual needs their flocks, sympathizing with Acts of Parliament, out of sympathy with zeal."

And although for the present the appointment is to be made by Her Majesty the Queen, by Letters Patent, yet as the Bill evidently contemplates the ultimate creation of a Dean and Chapter, we shall then have the shocking profanation of an election by the congé d'elire, when the Dean and Chapter solemnly meet to invoke the Divine guidance to enable them to choose a chief pastor of the diocese, when the choice has been already made for them by the Prime Minister, and that choice is imposed on them in so peremptory a fashion that, in case of refusal, they are liable to heavy penalties—such as forfeiture of land and imprisonment. But there is another objection I have to this Bill, and there I have a distinct locus standi as a Nonconformist—that is, that it proceeds on the assumption that practically, as well as theoretically, the whole population of this country are members of the Church of England. The promoters of an increased Episcopate always quite coolly take this for granted. They point to a particular district or country, which has so many hundreds of thousands of souls, and they say, there is only one Bishop to take care of all these souls, while it is perfectly well known to everybody that there are millions of people in this country—I am sure it is no exaggeration to say more than one-half of the church and chapel-going population—who have renounced their allegiance to the Church, and who, therefore, do not require, and will not accept, Episcopal supervision. Now, as a Nonconformist, I protest against keeping up this fiction. Take, for instance, the case of Cornwall. Much was made in "another place" of the destitution of Cornwall, when a similar Bill to this was under discussion. It was said that another Bishop was imperatively demanded for that part of the country. And immediately the Lord Lieutenant of the county got up in his place and declared that they did not want any Bishop, as the great bulk of the people were Nonconformists. This view of the matter has been so forcibly put in an article which appeared a few weeks ago in The Times, that I ask permission of the House to read a few sentences from it. After referring to some objections made by Lord Shaftesbury to Lord Lyttelton's Bill, the article proceeds—

"But if Lord Shaftesbury seems to go a little further than becomes a professed Churchman, the great majority of the inhabitants of these Isles, for one reason or another, go a good deal further in their objection to any functionary who assumes to combine in his own person spiritual with political power and authority. They do not like being any wise committed to it, even if themselves be absolutely protected against it, and their body, soul, and estate, be in no wise threatened. The feeling of a Nonconformist, a Presbyterian, or a Roman Catholic is that if a man choose to call himself the Bishop of Colchester, we will say, and is so called by his co-religionists, they have no objection; but they do object to their representatives in Parliament giving any national sanction to the exclusive assumption of that character. If we suppose any town or district where one form of Dissent or any other now seems in full possession, it may very consistently object to Parliament permitting anybody to claim, by his very title, authority over the souls whose lot is cast within those boundaries."

But does anybody want more Bishops of the same type as those now existing? I fail to see any evidence of that. Who wants them? Certainly, not the Nonconformists, who refuse to acknowledge their authority or to accept their services. But do members of the Church of England ask for more? I believe that considerable machinery has been set in operation to get up Petitions in favour of an increased Episcopate. But in the last Report of the Committee on Public Petitions it would appear that the Petitions hitherto presented had an aggregate number of signatures not amounting to quite 3,000. But the best proof that there is no demand for more Bishops is the Universal dissatisfaction expressed by all parties in the Church with the present Bishops. And what renders this the more striking is the fact that no one pretends to deny that the Gentlemen who occupy the Bench are not only gentlemen of irreproachable personal character, but of most exemplary diligence in the discharge of their laborious duties. And yet how are they spoken of by the organs of the various parties in the Church? I will take first The Standard, which is understood to be the organ of the Conservative Party generally. In 1864, that journal said—

"The Bench of Bishops is filled with the Ministers' creatures who openly avow, with an elasticity of conscience to which only Episcopacy can attain, that they are bound to vote even for a falsehood, rather than not magnify their makers."

Then take the organs of the High Church Party generally. I find in The Church Times these words—

“There is probably no body of men in the world who, so far as outward evidence goes, care less for the furtherance of religion than the English Bishops.”

The same journal in April, 1868, said—

“A sad and lengthened experience has taught us that there is little to be hoped for from the present Bench of Bishops, when cowardice and unfaithfulness prompt the evasion of a plain duty.”

The Church Herald again, the organ of another section of the High Church party, says—

“There never was a time when the members of the Episcopal body were held in less respect and repute than at present, or when their power to control the clergy except by legal process was so weak.”

And what makes the fact of the existence of this feeling among the class represented by The Church Times and The Church Herald more significant and remarkable is the fact that they regard the Episcopal office with an almost idolatrous veneration. I remember when the Oxford Tracts first appeared, they spoke of the Bishops in language that seemed to me, I own, to be extravagant. They said—

“The Bishops stand in the place of the Apostles so far as the office of ruling is concerned; and whatever we ought to do, had we lived when the Apostles were alive, the same ought we to do for the Bishops. He that despiseth them despiseth the Apostles.”

Again, addressing the clergy—

“Exalt our holy Fathers, the Bishops, as the representatives of the Apostles and the Angels of the Churches, and magnify your office as being ordained by them to take part in their ministry.”

And yet, in spite of this profound reverence for the office, such as I have quoted is the language they use in reference to those who now fill that office. There is another powerful Party in the Church, the Evangelical Party. The judgment pronounced by the organs of that Party is no less emphatic. Thus I find The Rock speaking in 1869—

“Do our Bishops sit in the House of Lords to maintain the rights of their Order? If so, they have betrayed them. Do they sit there to maintain the cause of the Established religion which they profess? This, too, they have betrayed with the spirit of a craven, and with a baseness that has no parallel in the annals even of Paganism. Do they sit there as the guardians of the Protestant interest, of a Protestant Empire? These, too, they have betrayed, and not only betrayed, but have thrown the full weight of their position and power into the opposing scale of Popery.”

The same unfortunate journal, on another occasion, speaks in the following accents of despair:—

“The life of a Protestant journalist, always one of constant labour and anxiety, is rendered doubly harassing by the action of the Bishops. One or other member of the Episcopal Bench is for ever doing something that he, if faithful to his Ordination vows, ought not to have done, or leaving undone something that, as the overseer of a Protestant Church, he ought to do. And all this while there be some amongst us who raise the cry of ‘More Bishops,’ to which the nation’s response will shortly be, ‘Save us from those we have.’”

The Record, another important organ of the same party, said in 1869—

“The Prelates have acted in direct opposition to the cause of Protestantism, and instead of maintaining, like their forefathers, a firm protest against ‘the Man of Sin,’ they have invited the bitter gibes of Liberationists, who have said that the ‘almighty dollar,’ and not Christian Protestantism, is now the watchword of the Bishops.”

And in regard to the latest act of the Bishops—the issue of their allocution on the state of the Church—I find one of the Church journals, The Church Herald, giving a sort of résumé or summary of the judgment pronounced by the whole Ecclesiastical Press of the country on this act, which is represented as one of universal dissatisfaction. It gives extracts from The Guardian, Record, John Bull, Church Times, Church Review, Church News of Scotland, and Literary Churchman, and then sums up the whole in the following words:—

“Whatever this response may reveal as to the relations between the clergy and the laity, it leaves no doubt upon another matter which is hardly of less importance. It makes it unmistakably clear that the great alienation under which we are suffering is that of the whole Church, clergy, and laity alike, from the Bishops. It is manifest that all confidence in them is gone—happily not as Bishops, but only as men. Their office was never so highly esteemed as at present, and it may be added that their inherent claims as Catholic Bishops were never so firmly established. But no one trusts them. The all but universal judgment upon them (and of course as we are all compromised by their proceedings, we are all entitled to form one) is that their rule is not equitable and impartial, that their speeches and letters are not straightforward and truthful, and that, being the Church’s highest officers, they are, unhappily, too ready to sacrifice her rights and claims, and even her doctrine, to popular clamour or for the sake of standing well with the world.”

Now, I offer no opinion as to the correctness or justice of these opinions. I merely refer to them as indications of the state of feeling that exists in the Church itself in regard to the existing Bishops, and as a strong presumption that at least there is no desire for an increase of the same class of Bishops. But I think I have proof that there is not merely indifference, but positive hostility against the present projects for an increased Episcopate. Some one has sent me a paper containing an account of a remarkable meeting lately held in Exeter, and Exeter is a sort of Mecca of Episcopacy. We are told that it was called by a circular largely signed by laymen and clerics belonging to all schools and parties in the Church. After long consultation the conclusion in thus stated—

“In the discussion which followed the greatest unanimity was evinced as to the scandalous injustice involved in the present mode of appointing Bishops, and as to the particular injustice contemplated in Lord Lyttelton's Bill by denying to Churchmen any voice in the election of the Bishops of the new Sees for which Churchmen are expected to provide funds. The meeting was also unanimous in considering that now or never was the time for the Church to assert her right in this matter. Indeed, the only difference of opinion was as to whether the demand should not be made applicable to the whole system of appointing Bishops, instead of being confined to the new Sees to be created under the Bills of Lord Lyttelton and Mr. Cross, and ultimately an Amendment, placing the demand on the broad and general basis, was carried by a large majority.”

With regard to the particular arrangements made under the Bill, I have not much to say. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, in introducing the measure, was eloquent as to the generosity of the Bishops of Winchester and Rochester, the one for giving up his country, and the other his town residence to form the nucleus of a fund for the endowment of the new Bishopric. He said that it was really a gift offered to the Church by the Bishops. With all respect this does not appear a very accurate description of the matter. These Bishops at most had only surrendered their interest in two residences during their term of office. Beyond that, they were merely liberal with other people's property. Why, Danbury, the residence of the Bishop of Rochester, was bought for him or his predecessor some 30 years ago by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for £28,157. And with regard to the great sacrifice made in regard to these houses, one of the clerical journals says—

“Great praise has been bestowed upon Dr. Harold Browne and Dr. Claughton for their very generous and most noble offers; but the truth seems to be that the palaces which they have offered to give up are of the nature of white elephants—that is to say, of possessions which, in the present state of Episcopal incomes, are rather an embarrassment than a benefit.”

Besides which, each of them gives up £500 a-year, not from his own salary but from the salary of his successor to augment the income of the new Bishopric. So that their generosity rather reminds one of the inscription which some wag placed on a bridge built by a Mr. Brown—

“Mr. Brown, of his great bounty, Built this bridge at the expense of the county!”

Some years ago, an attempt was made to increase the Episcopate. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Liskeard (Mr. Horsman) opposed it in so powerful and convincing a speech that he seems for the time to have defeated the project. That, like the present project, did not propose to ask any money direct from the coffers of the State for endowing the new Bishoprics, but to do so by manipulating existing ecclesiastical funds. The ground taken by the right hon. Gentleman on that occasion was ground which I think may be fitly taken by conscientious Churchmen on the present occasion. He contended that if they had funds at their disposal by the better administration of ecclesiastical property, the money could be turned to better account in the augmentation of small livings, than in the creation and endowment of new Bishops. He stated some most startling facts as to the condition of the working clergy; and although, no doubt, much improvement has taken place since then, there is still ample room for further improvement in this matter. Canon Gregory, at a meeting of the Curates' Augmentation Fund, lately held at Willis's Rooms, stated that there are 1,742 beneficed clergy who receive only £100 a-year; 2,035 who receive between £100 to £150; and 1,796 between £150 and £200. So that there are 5,573 beneficed clergy whose income is below, or only £200 a-year. The condition of the curates is still worse, and this being so, if you can economize anything out of the revenues of the Church, is not this a better direction for its use than in the multiplication of Bishops? When I consider the formidable assaults that are made in these days upon the foundations, I will not say, of the Christian religion, but of all religious faith, so that men's minds are filled with trouble and anxiety on the most important of all questions, and then see how those who are, or who claim to be, the official representatives of the national Christianity, omitting the weightier matters of the law, are busying themselves with what I call the "mint and anise and cummin" of religion, with questions of postures, and gestures, and garments—when I think of the masses of our population that are lying outside the pale, I will not say of the Church of England, but, unhappily, of all our Churches—and I could quote an eloquent passage to this effect from a book lately published by the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope), a book in the views of which I do not agree, but which I have read with admiration of its ability, learning, and temper; and when I further think of the hundreds—nay, thousands—of the working clergy of the Church of England—godly, learned, and laborious men, who are leading a life of pinching penury which it is most painful to contemplate, and then hear the cry for more Bishops, more Bishops for the House of Lords, more Bishops for whom large salaries and sumptuous palaces must be provided, and who have to be clothed in purple and fine linen, I feel inclined to say—

"Non tali auxilio, nec defensoribus istis

I have no wish to put any obstacle in the way of the increased efficiency of the Church as a spiritual institution. On the contrary, I can with my whole heart wish it God-speed in all work of this nature that it is doing. But if the Church of England wishes really to develop its forces—and I believe there are great forces capable of development in that Church—it can only be on one condition, and that is freedom—freedom from that entangling alliance with the State which cripples its energies, sullies its purity, compromises its dignity, impairs its efficiency, and gives rise to many occasions of scandals, which bring reproach, not on the Church only, but on our common Christianity.

Mr. Richard

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Richard.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, no doubt, the hon. Gentleman, from his own point of view, was right in his general argument at first; but he strayed away from the points with which he had a right to deal when he brought forward trumpery rubbish from old articles in The Rock and The Church Herald, as if they were the voice of the real parties in the Church of England. As a High Churchman he repudiated The Church Herald, and he would like to see any member of the great Low Church party get up and say he was not ashamed of The Rock. If he had cared to come down with his pockets stuffed with all the little contemptible so-called religious organs of the various sects of Nonconformists, he could easily have capped any of those quotations which the hon. Member had given, or could give, from the most flimsy utterances of any little section in the Church of England, by language even more outrageous from those foolish periodicals, and equally written to sell and not to convince. If they wanted the real opinion of the English Church they must look elsewhere. The question must be treated on a broader ground; and in occupying it, the hon. Gentleman had, in fact, destroyed his own argument by his candour in appealing to them to look upon the Church as a spiritual organization. His contention answered itself, because he failed to disprove that this Bill was intended to develop in the truest sense the spiritual organization of the Church of England. The Church of England was an Episcopal Church, by which was meant that it considered Bishops to be an integral portion of the Christian ministry: working ministers with definite religious duties as much as the pastors of any congregation. So by the essential principles of that Church, a Bill to increase the Episcopate was a Bill to strengthen the Christian ministry. The hon. Gentleman rode off by denouncing Bishops as pompous worldlings, and tried to derogate from the unselfish generosity shown by two of that body in respectively offering to give up a town and a country house, on the score that those were only official residences, as if the abandonment of an official residence was not a personal sacrifice to an office holder who was living in it. The hon. Member had no right to bring such charges against the Episcopate, before he could prove that the Bishops of our Church had not largely and habitually contributed out of their own means, and even sacrificed their own private fortunes for the good of the Church. He had found much comfort for his opinions in some spasmodic resolutions passed at a meeting at Exeter. Now, no Bishop had in his lifetime the character of being more prelate than the late Bishop of Exeter, but whatever might have been thought of the theological opinions of Bishop Phillpotts, of his splendid munificence there could be no doubt; and when he remembered the gigantic, unrelenting work of a Wilberforce, and the deep learning of a Thirlwall, he could not patiently listen to comparisons between the general body of the clergy and the Bishops, as if the latter were rich drones and the parish clergy the only people who sacrificed life, health, time, and comfort to the service of their Lord and Master. It could not be denied that this Bill was a private re-arrangement within the lines of the Church of England of its own resources, and in that character it ought to be safe from such opposition as had been offered to it. He (Mr. Beresford Hope) took the present Bill as it stood, and he thanked all who had been concerned in bringing it forward. He said that with the more feeling, because he had himself charge of another measure which had been carried through the House of Lords by his noble Friend Lord Lyttelton, and which he hoped would be accepted in that House also. He saw no discrepancy between the two Bills, which had the same object of increasing the efficiency of the Episcopate. They were drawn on different lines; but the lines were parallel, not clashing. This measure provided for a peculiar and exceptional want, which there were peculiar and exceptional means to meet; and the other provided for no new Sees by name, while it supplied a general machinery for the creation of new dioceses when means were forthcoming from private sources. The ancient See of Rochester, having by the growth of London been brought close to the metropolis, it was an eminently practical step to make a Bishopric of South London attached to Rochester. Surrey was now partly a rural and partly an urban county, and wherever the great community of London had surged over and spread itself, those old county distinctions had disappeared, and the Capital only remained to be treated in its great unity by all the special appliances needed to provide for the spiritual necessities of the population. Rural Surrey still remained attached to the old princely See of Winchester, and he thought it well that, for the present, at least, that famous diocese should retain so much of its former amplitude. Rochester, too, had a magnificent Cathedral and great traditions, and there was already a teeming Kentish London under its administration, and these considerations justified placing urban Surrey under the charge of the Bishop of Rochester. He had ventured to make these remarks because he believed that a feeling natural in itself, though, he thought, overstrained, had shown itself in some Surrey quarters against any dismemberment of the county. Essex and Hertfordshire, which had been by the strange management of Church reformers in the bygone generation, joined to the diocese of Rochester, were clearly marked out as fitting space for a Bishopric, even if the area had not contained a church so historical and artistic as the Abbey Church of St. Albans. There was there the largest church in the Realm, and one of the grandest, which marked the spot where the first Christian blood in the Island was shed. On that spot, the historical, the practical, and the sentimental met, and such a place was eminently fitted to become the head-quarters of a new diocese. If Surrey wanted a Bishop Lord Lyttelton's Bill showed the way to provide one. Let that Bill become law, and the Surrey people would then only have to find the means. Surrey could thus become a diocese with its cathedral at St. Saviour's, and West Kent would be quite a sufficient area for the pastoral care of the Bishop of Rochester. But in the meantime, let the friends of the Church take the good thing that was offered in the present measure, and seek to supplement it by the wider provisions of the pending enabling Bill. He thanked Her Majesty's Government for this good beginning, and he trusted to see further progress made in the same direction.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was one of those who concurred in the conclusions at which the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken had arrived, although from different and almost opposite reasons. He had never been in favour of the disestablishment of the Church of England, which he had always thought had been a great advantage to the country, because the Church of England was regulated, governed, and, he might almost say, created by Parliament and the State. The reason why he should support this Bill was that, in the most distinct manner, it pointed out that situation of the Church of England. The reason that he approved of this Bill was that it was founded on what was sometimes attacked as Erastianism. But for this Bill there could be no Bishop of St. Albans. His appointment and authority were to be regulated by Act of Parliament, and the nomination was to be made by the Chief Officer of the State in this country. That might be a right or a wrong theory. He thought it a right theory, and he should approve the Bill. The Bill having proposed to create a Bishopric by Act of Parliament, and a Bishop by patent, proceeded to lay down other regulations which were to be made by the Queen in Council. Now anything more accurate than that constitutional view of the nature of a national Church, he thought, it would be impossible to conceive. The hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard) pointed out that the Church had nothing to say to the Bill; that neither Convocation nor the clergy generally had been asked their opinion as to whether there should be a new Bishop or not, or as to where the new Bishopric was to be situated. That very fact, however, furnished the strongest possible vindication of the argument of those who maintained that the assent of Convocation was not necessary in such cases. The Bill, in short, brought forth in the clearest way the principles on which Church legislation was really founded. It asserted the absolute authority of Parliament that it was the prerogative of Parliament to deal with the affairs of the Church on its own authority without consulting the clergy or anybody else. But for the very same reasons for which he should give his support to the present measure, he should certainly object to that roving Bill for the creation of impecunious and eleemosynary Bishoprics throughout the country which the hon. Member for Cambridge University (Mr. B. Hope) was about to bring under the notice of the House. The Bill under discussion seemed to him to be a practical proposal founded on sound principles, assuming the propriety—a question which ought not to be argued on that occasion—of the existence of an Establishment. Whether or not an establishment was capable of being defended, they ought not to argue the question on a Bill like that. This was not a question of whether they were to help a Bishopric by holding a bazaar, or handing the hat round. He agreed with the hon. Member (Mr. B. Hope) in his disapproval of the use which had been made of the extracts from newspapers. From his experience of the semi-religious and semi-ecclesiastical papers, he should think that they were among the most foolish to be found among the periodical press. Reference had been made to the language used in The Standard newspaper in the year 1864, and though he did not remember all the leading articles which for 20 years past had appeared in The Standard he should judge that the language referred to was used the morning after some Party division, in which the Bishops had voted on the wrong side. He should rather choose to refer to a more recent copy of that paper, and take the number which appeared the other day, in which that well-informed journal stated that the only two Bishops who voted were in favour of the Government Army Bill, and on that occasion The Standard expressed a more favourable opinion than it had set forth so many years previously, and therefore he did not think they ought to judge the authorities of the Church by extracts picked out of newspapers in such a manner. An objection had been made to the appointment of the Bishops being intrusted to the Minister of the day. But who was the Minister of the day? He was a person elected by a majority of the Representatives of the people, and the object of placing the appointment of the Bishops in his hands was that their election should be made in accordance with the national sentiment. He believed this plan would be likely to secure the nomination of sensible and temperate persons, while if the power was vested in the clergy themselves the appointment would represent nothing but the violent opinions of the majority which happened to be dominant in the Church at that particular time. For these reasons, he was not at all unfavourable to the political nomination of Bishops. This Bill had been framed strictly in accordance with the general principles, whether good or bad, on which the Church stood—namely, the right of Parliament to deal with the affairs of the Church absolutely and without control—and, therefore, it should have his support.

COLONEL MAKINS reminded the hon. and learned Member for Oxford that though the Crown could nominate to a Bishopric the person nominated did not become a Bishop until he was consecrated, so that it was not correct to say that the Crown could make a Bishop. It was right enough that the Crown should make territorial arrangements for the Church; but dealing with faith and doctrine was altogether a different matter. The Bill of last year did not refer to these matters. With reference to the demand of a Bishopric for Cornwall he should say that the fact of there being so few Churchmen there, was owing to the want of a Bishop. He hoped the Government would meet the necessity in a practical manner. He desired to express the opinions of his constituents in Essex in favour of the Bill, and though they did not all approve the territorial arrangements in their details, they were in favour of the Bill as a step in the right direction.

MR. MONK agreed very much with the views expressed by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford. He considered that it was better that a new Bishopric of St. Albans should be created than that a Suffragan Bishop should be appointed. He thought no one would deny that the Bishops of Winchester and Rochester had shown great consideration in depriving themselves of their residences and of part of their incomes in order to help to endow the diocese of St. Albans. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary in this Bill had dispensed with the appointment of a Dean and Chapter for the election of the first Bishop—he had recurred to the practice of appointment by Letters Patent, which obtained in the reign of Edward VI., and had entirely given up the principle of election by congé d'élire. When the Bill went into Committee it was his intention to move that it was inexpedient that any Bishop of St. Albans should be appointed otherwise than by Letters Patent from the Crown.

MR. GRANTHAM claimed for the large population of Surrey that it had a right to be heard in this matter. The hon. Member for Merthyr (Mr. Richard) urged that there was no strong feeling for the appointment of a Bishop, because Petitions had not been sent up; but the truth was, that most people who took an interest in such matters preferred to make their views known through their Representatives. If they analyzed the statistics in relation to the population of the districts to be effected by the change, they would find that the new Bishop of Rochester would be practically the Bishop of Surrey, for out of 1,250,000 souls which the diocese would contain, it would be found that 1,000,000 of them would live in two of the divisions of Surrey; and, as one of the Members for Surrey, he hoped the House would allow him to say a word or two upon the subject, because he must admit that most of his constituents, who felt interested in the matter, had been much opposed to this Bill, because they thought that the importance of the county, from population and position, was such that Surrey should have a Bishop to itself, and they were very much opposed to any division of their county, as well as to its being simply tacked on to Rochester. At first, he was inclined to agree with them, and to think also that that alteration of the dioceses was done simply for the benefit of the Bishops of St. Albans and of Winchester, and looking at it as a question of population only, there could be no doubt that it was a direct benefit to them, as they were relieved of the largest mass of their population without any practical reduction of their incomes, while the new diocese of Rochester would have a far larger population than either of the old bishoprics, but would only receive half the emoluments. Looking, however, to area, it would be found that the old bishoprics would still have far larger dioceses than the new one, and quite as large as they could properly work, and as to income, the new diocese of Rochester would, at the death of the present Bishop—who would, it was believed, exchange his Bishopric for the new see of St. Albans—receive the same income that was assigned to the majority of the other bishoprics. While, if they did not accept the scheme which was undoubtedly a great improvement of the existing state of things, he could not see his way to any improvement being made for many years. They ought to look to the practical rather than the particular and sentimental result of the measure. The inhabitants of Surrey ought, therefore, he thought, to accept the Bill, and be thankful to the Home Secretary for the efforts he had made to meet their wants. With these views, he should support the Bill, but he would suggest that the name should be altered from the Bishopric of Rochester to that of Rochester and Southwark. There was in Southwark one of the finest churches (St. Saviour's) in the South of England, and the new Bishop would therefore find a suitable Cathedral church for his ministrations. The best answer that could be given to the hon. Member for Merthyr, that instead of creating bishoprics measures should be taken for increasing the incomes of the clergy, was to be found in the establishment of the Bishop of London's fund and a similar one in the diocese of Winchester, which funds were entirely owing to the work of the respective Bishops of those dioceses.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS said, that although he could not agree with the hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. B. Hope), and the hon. and learned Member for Oxford (Sir William Harcourt), in their very different reasons for supporting the measure, yet he should support the second reading of the Bill. He would first trouble the House with a brief chapter from his own ecclesiastical biography. He was born in the town of Hertford, where he lived for a time under the mild reign of Dr. Kaye, Hertford then forming part of the diocese of Lincoln. Before he was confirmed, and without his consent, he was transferred to the more vigorous administration of Dr. Bloomfield to the diocese of London, and again, without his consent, he was transferred to the diocese of Rochester. It was, however, obviously inconvenient to be governed by a Bishop so distant as the Bishop of Lincoln, and also equally inconvenient to be governed by a Bishop living on the other side of the Thames, and he therefore accepted the Bill as a mere re-arrangement of dioceses, so that Hertford and Essex might be more efficiently governed under a resident Bishop. He thought the Home Secretary had done well to bring in this Bill.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he did not intend to enter into the broad question raised by the hon. Member (Mr. Richard) as to the existence or not of the Established Church. He fully agreed with those who held that the nation gained more from its connection with the Church than the Church gained from connection with the State. At the same time, he was fully alive to the advantages which the Church derived from its connection with the State. Persons of all denominations also gained much from the established existence of a Church celebrated for its moderate doctrine, and in which, in the main, every one was kept practically to that doctrine. He need not refer to the great benefits which the Church of England had conferred upon Christendom by the position it had taken in regard to the doctrines of the Reformation, and in setting an example to all other religious denominations in regard to the work of the poor. Assuming that the Church of England was to continue to exist, and that there were to be Bishops in it, then, if there were three large dioceses in it like London, Rochester, and Winchester, the Bishops of which had more work on their hands than they could possibly get through, and if they came to an arrangement beneficial to the Church by dividing those three dioceses into four, and by that means the work could be better carried out both with respect to the Church and the nation, then this Parliament would be wise to accept it. Upon that practical ground he based this Bill. His hon. Friend the Member for East Surrey (Mr. Grantham) had stated with perfect truth that there was at first considerable opposition in that county to the Bill because the inhabitants of that county had done a great deal towards providing a Bishop of Surrey; but he believed that now the common sense prevailing in the county and other parts of the diocese was that this was a practical measure for meeting the present purpose, and would be a great relief to the Bishop of Winchester, and insure due episcopal supervision for that part of Surrey which would be transferred to the diocese of Rochester. With regard to his hon. Friend's proposal that the Bishop should be called the Bishop of Rochester and Southwark, there was, he was informed, a practical objection. He did not wish to create by this Bill a Bishopric of Southwark as well as Rochester. He knew of no precedent for a Bishopric being called by two names, unless there had been two Sees previously in existence. If he called the Bishopric by the two names, he would be creating practically a Bishopric of Southwark. He had met the people of Surrey so far that there was a clause in the Bill providing that the residence of the Bishop of Rochester should be in Southwark. That would be a position from which the diocese would be very easily worked, and it would give great satisfaction to that part of the country. He trusted the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) would not think it necessary to encumber the Bill by an abstract Resolution on the subject of the congé d'élire, because he had made no provision in the Bill for the establishment of a dean and chapter, having no funds for that purpose. The dean and chapter could not be created without an Act of Parliament, when the hon. Member could state his objections, and meanwhile the Bishop of St. Albans would be created by the Crown by Letters Patent. These three Bishops deserved the thanks of the Church, and, above all, of the inhabitants of the diocese over which they presided, for the arrangements they had made for dividing the dioceses and for the sacrifices they had made. As the character of the Bishops generally had been somewhat impugned, he must say that he did not think there could be found a body of men of an equal amount of learning and intelligence who were animated by a more direct and single-minded wish to devote their lives to the performance of their duties or who worked harder than the Bishops of the Church of England.

COMMITTEE. [Progress 6th May.]

Clause 21 (Proceedings against offenders).

MR. MUNTZ moved, in page 7, line 5, after "by," to insert "the Inland Revenue Department, Somerset House, whose certificate shall be final." He believed the trade were extremely jealous of the certificate given by the analyst at Quarter Sessions, but would be contented with the certificate of the Inland Revenue Department.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, his hon. Friend in his Amendment had somewhat confused the function of the Judge and analyst. He could not accept it, on the ground that it proposed to leave the final decision on questions of adulteration with the Department of Somerset House. That decision must rest with the Courts of Law. He would prefer that the hon. Member should allow the hon. Member for Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) to put his Amendment on the same point, as it seemed to him to meet it better. He was willing on the part of the Inland Revenue Commissioners to undertake the duties of analyzing, without, however, giving to their decision any character of finality if it could be challenged on any subsequent analysis.

SIR HENRY PEEK said, it was admitted that there were very few competent analysts to be found, and believed that there had been several miscarriages of justice throughout the country. Speaking on behalf of traders he had to say that they were not at all disposed to object that their goods should be thoroughly examined; but they desired that the examination should be made thoroughly, certainly, and sensibly. In the majority of cases the examination had been neither thorough, nor certain, nor sensible. In one case a gentleman who had filled the office of high sheriff of the county of Anglesey had been fined for selling the finest green tea, and in the county of Northampton several traders had been fined for selling coffee adulterated with acorns. Some samples of the coffee were sent to London to be examined, and it was found that there was not a particle of acorn in the coffees, whereupon the local analyst admitted that he had made a mistake. In regard to cocoa persons had been charged with adulterating it with sugar, flour, and honey—in no civilized country was it prepared otherwise—and on the certificates given there had been many convictions. He believed that all pepper contained a certain amount of silica; but a certificate had been given that a sample of pepper contained 1 per cent of siliceous matter, on which a trader, but for wiser counsels prevailing, would have been fined. Personally, he should rather like to see all the analyses which might be necessary under the Act left to the Department at Somerset House. This would be a cheaper and more satisfactory course than the one proposed in the Bill. He quite agreed in the observation that if the chemists at Somerset House were made the sole analysts for the purposes of this Bill, it would largely prevent adulteration, while the ratepayers would be gainers by the change. He did not think that it was fair that the same magistrates who in Petty Sessions had the appointment of the local analysts should afterwards at Quarter Sessions determine appeals from the reports of those persons. He should therefore support the Amendment.

DR. C. CAMERON remarked that the scarcity of competent analysts now complained of was owing to the sudden demand for their services, which was the consequence of recent legislation. It would, however, be every year less and less felt. The personnel at the laboratory at Somerset House consisted of a principal, a deputy principal, eight permanent assistants, and eight temporary assistants, and it was impossible that such a staff could get through the enormous amount of work that would be thrown upon it under the proposal of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz), and it could not be increased without great cost to the country. With regard to the finality of the Somerset House certificate, the view of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was, in his opinion, the true one. An analyst was not a Judge, nor had he to find a trader guilty of adulteration. He had simply to report upon the samples submitted to him. The method of appeal provided for England was not so satisfactory as that provided for Scotland; but the proposed Amendment was not the way to remedy matters. In England the appeal was to be from Petty Sessions to Quarter Sessions, whereas in Scotland it was from the Justices to the Sheriff. He suggested that the County Court would be the most suitable court of appeal.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, that in accepting the proposal that all the analyses should be conducted at Somerset House the Government were incurring considerable responsibility. He should wish to know what security the Government had that the assistants at Somerset House were properly qualified for the discharge of such important duties as were about to be thrown upon them by this Bill, because it was evident that the salaries they received were not such as the first chemists in the country would be entitled to. He, however, should not divide the Committee on the Amendment, because he merely wished to point out to the Government the dangerous responsibility they had taken upon themselves in accepting this Amendment.

MR. MUNTZ said, he was willing to waive his Amendment in favour of that of the hon. Member for Leicestershire.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PELL moved, in page 7, to leave out line 6 and to end of Clause, and insert—

“By persons to be appointed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, who shall thereupon make the analysis, and give a certificate to such justices of the result of the analysis; and the expense of such analysis shall be paid by the complainant or the defendant as the justices may by order direct.”

He was very glad that the right hon. Gentleman had accepted his Amendment.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH would accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leicestershire, and Her Majesty's Government were quite aware of the responsibility they were taking upon themselves by so doing.

MR. SULLIVAN observed, that the analyses conducted at Somerset House would command the confidence of the country.

SIR THOMAS CHAMBERS said, he was glad the Government had consented to give a better security for the skill and competence of the analysts, inasmuch as practically the decision of the Justices would always be governed by the analyst's report.

Sir Henry Peek

MR. GRANTHAM said, he thought cases might arise in which it would not be desirable to make either the complainant or the defendant pay the expense of the analysis, and that some discretion in this respect ought to be left to the Justices. Up to this time the public had not had confidence in the analysts, but he hoped the result of the debate would be to restore that confidence. He thought the Amendment would be better without the alteration of the hon. Member for Leicestershire.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR was of opinion that the terms of the Amendment were too vague. He suggested that the words "the chemical officers in the employment of the Inland Revenue" should be substituted for the words "some persons to be appointed by the Commissioners."

DR. LUSH suggested that the clause should be withdrawn for the present in order that the Government might have an opportunity of re-considering it.

MR. RAMSAY said, he thought it of importance that analysts should be examined as to their literary as well as their scientific qualifications.

MR. STAVELEY HILL approved of the suggestion that the articles should be sent to the Inland Revenue Office for examination.

Amendment, with the substituted words, agreed to.

CORONERS (IRELAND) BILL—[BILL 36.]

(Mr. Vance, Sir John Gray, Mr. Downing.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. VANCE, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, it was identical with the one which passed a second reading last Session, and which enacted that coroners should be paid by salaries and not by fees. It might be described as a measure for improving the administration of justice in Ireland and raising the condition of the coroners in that country, which was at present unfair to themselves and injurious to the public interests. They were at present paid by fees instead of salaries, while in England the coroners had, since 1860, been paid by salaries in the place of fees. The coroners of Ireland were, in fact, the only judicial persons who were at the present moment paid by fees; and, as it might be said that they held inquests unnecessarily for the sake of the fees, they wished to be protected against such an imputation. The Select Committee who sat on the Grand Jury Laws in 1868 recommended that the coroners should be paid in future by salaries upon an average of the duties they had performed for the last five years. The Irish coroners were willing that this recommendation should be carried out, but not upon the basis of the present miserable scale of payment. The fee for an inquest in Ireland was only £1 10s., although in many cases the coroner had to travel long distances, and although the inquest might be protracted over one, two, or three days. Living was more expensive than it was when these fees were originally fixed, and the keep of horses had also greatly risen. It was therefore proposed that in fixing the payment by salaries the expense of holding the inquests during the last five years should be taken at £2 10s., instead of £1 10s., together with the average of all allowances actually received by each coroner during the same period. That would give each Irish coroner, on an average, a salary of £83, and not more than £100 in any case, which was not unreasonably high, considering that the English coroners received, on an average, from £200 to £500 a-year, and that the Middlesex coroner received £2,000 a-year. If there were any reason to complain of inefficiency on the part of coroners in Ireland it must be attributed more to the law than to themselves, for there was now no qualification required for the office—anybody might, in fact, fill it. He therefore proposed that magistrates might be coroners, as they could not always obtain the assistance of professional men, and accordingly after the passing of the Act no person was to be appointed to the position unless duly qualified to practise medicine or surgery and registered under the Medical Act, a barrister-at-law, a solicitor or attorney, or a justice of the peace of five years' standing. The Bill further provided for the production of prisoners on remand, and that the election of a coroner should be concluded in one day, and not, as at present, continued for two days. He believed that this measure would tend to improve the administration of justice in Ireland by raising the condition of coroners, on whom a great responsibility was cast in elucidating the truth and administering the law. The Bill gave coroners power to appoint deputies, a privilege which existed in the boroughs of Ireland and in all the districts of England; but he thought coroners should not be Government officers, as they had sometimes to decide questions which arose between the Crown and the subject. It also proposed to grant superannuation, because men remained in the office longer than they could properly perform the duties of it; but it would be limited to two-thirds of the salary when the coroner had attained 70 years of age, and be paid only after 20 years' service in the office. They could, however, claim such superannuation earlier if they were, according to satisfactory medical testimony, incapacitated by reason of infirmity or illness. He believed the measure was almost universally approved by the Irish Members, and he trusted the Government would allow it to be read a second time, on the understanding that in Committee whatever Amendments were suggested would be fully considered and most likely carried out.

MR. MACARTNEY seconded the Motion, expressing a hope that the measure would meet with a better fate than that which befel a similar Bill introduced last year. Should the Government wish to oppose the Bill, he hoped they would defer doing so until it was in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed. "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Vance.)

THE O'CONOR DON differed in many respects as to his view of the Bill from the two hon. Gentlemen who preceded him. He did not rise for the purpose of moving the rejection of the second reading; but he believed that a considerable number of the Irish Members were either not aware of the provisions of the Bill or were satisfied that no necessity existed for its enactment. Instead of being a Bill for the better administration of justice, the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Vance) would have more correctly described it as a Bill for doubling or trebling the salaries of the coroners in Ireland. He confessed he was one of those who thought that in the present day the coroners might be dispensed with altogether, and assuredly if such an institution did not now exist no one would think of establishing it. The whole strength of the argument in favour of this office lay in its antiquity, and one of the chief features connected with this antiquity was that of unrestrained popular election. Coroners were elected by the ratepayers of the county, a popular body, very much as seats in that House were filled up, not on account of particular fitness for the duty, but by reason of some popular motive, and the choice of the electors was not confined, as was proposed in this Bill, to doctors, lawyers, or retired magistrates. He doubted much whether these technical qualifications would improve the state of things, and they seemed to him inconsistent with the idea of free popular election, which more generally turned upon questions as to a man's politics—whether, for instance, he was a Home Ruler or an Orangeman—rather than upon his technical fitness. His experience did not lead him to the belief that every man who was called to the Bar really knew law, and he doubted whether a qualification which was possessed by every briefless barrister would add to the strength of the office—so long, at least, as the election depended upon politics. If the hon. Member for Armagh allowed the law to remain as it was, and did not ask to have it amended, no person, perhaps, would stand up to propose the abolition of the office; but he objected to being asked to give local bodies the power of doubling or trebling, or it might be quadrupling by way of fixed salary, the rate of remuneration which had been paid for so long a period. In country districts he considered that the duties of coroner could very well be undertaken by the resident magistrates, or by two justices of the peace, who now were empowered to act in the absence of the coroner. His main objection to the Bill was the proposed increase of remuneration, and consequent increase in the rates. At present, no coroner could under any circumstance receive, no matter what amount of work he performed, or how many inquests he held, more than £100 a-year; but under the 4th clause of the hon. Member's Bill the Grand Jury were called upon to sanction a minimum increase by 75 percent of each coroner's remuneration, and as much more as they liked. There was really no restriction placed on their liberality. The first Grand Jury, too, that was empannelled after the passing of the Act was to settle the salary for ever in each respective county. Besides these, he had other very strong objections to the details of the Bill, which were very clumsily drawn out; and especially he considered that it would be very objectionable to reward a coroner, who had perhaps during the last five years been holding many unnecessary inquests, by fixing his salary at a higher figure than the salary of the coroner who had conscientiously done his duty.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER hoped that the Bill would be read a second time without a division, although there, no doubt, were matters in it which would require much consideration in Committee. He did not agree that the office of coroner should be abolished. It was an office of great antiquity, and was admirably adapted for the duties it had to perform, and he doubted if it would be possible to create a new officer exhibiting the same dignity and independence as that apportioned to the office of coroner. Although in Scotland the functions of coroner were discharged by the Procurator Fiscal, who was a most important officer, yet he certainly thought that it would be unsatisfactory to mix up the duties of stipendiary magistrate and coroner—unsatisfactory as regarded the duties of both of those offices. The matter should receive very careful and serious attention before any change was made in the office of coroner. The coroner was elected by the freeholders, and he was the representative of the people by virtue of the Queen's writ. As to the qualification for the office, anyone might be elected; but it was always supposed that no one would be chosen who was not fit for the office. The position of coroners in Ireland would be somewhat raised by this Bill, and it was a mistake, he considered, to make their salaries depend upon the number of inquests held in a given number of years, for the number of inquests did not depend upon the coroner himself, but upon mere accident; one year there might be a large number of accidental deaths in a certain district, whilst during the next year there were none at all. The salaries should be paid on the principle of a sufficient salary, with a view to securing the services of respectable, independent men, suitable for the performance of the duties of the office. He trusted his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland, when the Bill went into Committee, would consider, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, what salary was likely to secure an efficient person. On the whole, he (Sir George Bowyer) considered the Bill as one which deserved to be read a second time.

MR. LAW expressed his general concurrence in the views expressed by the hon. Member for Roscommon (The O'Connor Don). He did not understand the hon. Member to propose the abolition of the office of coroner; but the question, whether the duties of the office might not be quite as efficiently performed by other persons, was at least worth consideration, and many reasons might be adduced in its favour. It was said that in Scotland, where there were no coroners, the same functions were discharged by the Procurators Fiscal. But we had, besides coroners, officers analogous to the Scotch Procurators Fiscal. In Ireland there were, in every county, local sessional Crown prosecutors, who might well discharge some of the functions now discharged by coroners. There were also for each county, barristers, who on representing the Attorney General conducted all important Crown prosecutions at the assizes; and, besides, there were the stipendiary and other magistrates. It could hardly, therefore, be contended there was not in Ireland a staff of other officials quite equal to the discharge of the coroners' duties. With respect to the proposal in the Bill to allow coroners the power of appointing deputies, he believed such a course would be very inexpedient. The result would simply be absentee coroners and deputies doing the work for one-fourth of the salary, just as in the case of the Clerks of the Peace at present. Again, as to the proposal to fix and provide an increased salary to the office, it should be recollected the coroners were paid out of the county cess, which fell upon the farmers, and they might justly feel aggrieved by any appreciable increase to that impost. However, all he asked for was full consideration of the question. He did not oppose the second reading of the Bill; but as Notice of a Motion had been given to refer the Bill to a Select Committee, it occurred to him that this would be a desirable course to pursue, so as to have not only a careful examination of the several clauses, but also an inquiry into the larger question as to whether the office should be permanently continued.

MR. ALFRED MARTEN said, the subject was of importance not only to the part of the United Kingdom to which it specially referred, but also to the other parts where the office of coroner had been in full operation for many hundreds of years, and was now in operation with the general approval of the country. There could not be a doubt that complete satisfaction was given in the performance of their duties by the very learned and other persons who were holding the ancient and dignified office of coroner in the country; and any proposition to abolish the office would be looked upon as revolutionary, though a coroner might occasionally make some observations which were not befitting his office. He could quite understand that in Ireland there might be objections as to the way in which coroners were, appointed and paid, and as to the necessity of raising the qualifications of persons who were candidates for the office, but he could not understand how those objections should be made reasons for abolishing the office itself. He believed that in Ireland, as in England, it would be impossible to carry on the administration of justice efficiently without Coroners' Courts. Of course, they heard complaints from time to time of the proceedings in those Courts. The decisions of the juries and of the coroners were called in question, but that was only what happened with another ancient institution—trial by jury. They often heard complaints of ignorant or perverse verdicts, but no one proposed, therefore, to abolish trial by jury. As to the mode of electing coroners, it had been said that candidates appealed to political feeling, and that in many cases they succeeded in obtaining the office in consequence of party excitement or influence. That might be regretted; but he believed that it had not been proved that persons so elected had allowed party feelings to influence them in the discharge of their duties. If such misconduct were proved it would be in the power of the proper authority to remove the offender. It had been suggested that the public prosecutors in Ireland might act as substitutes for coroners; but the duty of a public prosecutor was to prosecute, and he could not do that until there was a person to be prosecuted. The inquiry of the coroner into the cause of death was to find, if necessary, who that person was. It was one thing to point to a person as being guilty and another to conduct a legal trial, with a view of fixing that guilt, and securing condign punishment; and therefore it was most important that they should not have the duties of a prosecutor mixed up with those of a coroner, which involved very often the admission of evidence that would not be allowed in a criminal investigation. He should vote for the second reading of the Bill, though there were some of its four leading provisions which, he thought, might be amended in Committee. It proposed that elections should not extend over one day. This shortening of time was adopted for the saving of expense, and was in the direction of all modern legislation. He also thought that payment by salaries instead of by fees would be an improvement;

but as it had been objected that a coroner who had held many inquests might thereby be awarded a higher salary than another less active, but not less efficient, who had held fewer inquests, he would suggest that that objection might be met by spreading the average amount of fees over a larger number of years than those named. The existing law as to qualification it was proposed to repeal, and to secure, as far as possible, a qualification which would lead to efficient persons being elected. In Committee he should be quite ready to support alteration in the proposed qualifications. The other provisions of interest had reference to the payment of witnesses and the superannuation of coroners; and with regard to those, he should be prepared to receive any reasonable proposition on the matter. In conclusion, he would express a hope that the Bill would receive a second reading.

MR. M'CARTHY DOWNING said, as his name was on the back of the Bill, he wished to say a few words as to the reasons which induced him to give it his support. One of the reasons which he thought showed the necessity for amending the present law was the fact that a coroner might have a person before him charged with committing murder, and at the close of the first day's proceedings, before the jury had arrived at their verdict, the prisoner might be committed to the county gaol for safe keeping. Next day, when the jury met again, the production of the prisoner might be refused. The hon. Member for Roscommon (the O'Connor Don) objected to the use of party symbols in the election of coroners; but it was not shown that this had any other effect than proving that the candidates were in harmony with the political feelings of those among whom they lived, not that it would injuriously or improperly affect the discharge of their official duties. He ventured to say that after the discussion which had taken place, and the expression of public opinion by English Members, no hon. Member would propose to abolish the office of coroner. The only question, therefore, was whether the existing law required amendment or not. He thought it was utterly impossible to uphold the present state of things, and that the Government would do what was wise and prudent in fixing the salary of the coroner. The Bill contained provisions for improving the machinery of the Coroners' Courts, especially with respect to the expenses of the coroners in attending inquests and the fees to medical men for attendance and post-mortem examinations. The Bill was, perhaps, not free from objections in some of its details, but those objections could be dealt with best in Committee, and it was important that such a momentous matter should be settled satisfactorily. He thought that it would be cruel now to disappoint the expectations raised in the bosoms of Irish coroners by preceding Governments.

MR. BUTT hoped the second reading of the Bill would be agreed to. He approved of its provisions on the whole. It would be a great mistake to suppose that the abolition of the office of coroner would be popular with any class of the people of Ireland. It would be regarded as a great change upon the ancient Constitution of the country to which they were deeply attached. The administration of justice by an independent and popularly elected officer gave them a feeling of confidence, which would be greatly weakened by the abolition of the office.

MR. STACPOOLE supported the second reading, and said, that in Committee he should propose that the election of coroner should be by ballot.

MR. SERJEANT SHERLOCK said, the names of the hon. Members on the back of the Bill showed that the question was not a Party one. As to the appointment of deputies being open to abuse, that might be prevented by giving the Lord Chief Justice power to revoke such appointment.

MR. O'LEARY was in favour of the office being maintained; but, at the same time, approved of the fixing of higher qualifications on the part of candidates. Those specified in the Bill were an improvement on the present law.

MR. GIBSON said, that both in England and in Ireland the elementary and primary idea of Coroners' Courts had been widely departed from. The Coroners' Court was established for the simple purpose of inquiring into the cause of death, and it was for the legal Courts to determine the question of guilt or innocence; but in consequence of the Coroners' Courts having gone beyond their original jurisdiction and inquired into all sorts of irrelevant issues, there had been within the last 20 years inquests extending over days, and even weeks. He therefore desired that a clause in the measure should clearly indicate that the proper province of the coroner was an inquiry as to how death had occurred, and that investigations as to who, if any, was guilty ought to be left to the Criminal Courts. He thought this Bill might be read a second time, because it introduced several improvements in the existing law. The payment of a salary instead of fees, and the fixing of qualifications higher than those of ordinary outsiders, were two of those improvements; and further, he agreed with the principle under which prisoners had a right to be present at an inquest. On the other hand, there were some objectionable provisions which would have to be carefully considered in Committee. One of those was the power to appoint deputies. No matter how much that power might be nominally subject to the approval of the Judges or magistrates, they might depend upon it that whenever the power of appointing a deputy was given it would be exercised. The coroner would reside far away from the district or county for which he was appointed, and some broken-down man, with the nominal qualifications, would be appointed as deputy at a low salary, or on small fees, to perform the duties. He also thought the principle of superannuation a right one, although he objected to the way in which it was proposed to be calculated, as it might lead to possible abuses. There were other provisions to which exception might be taken; but he would not oppose the second reading of the Bill which would require much consideration in Committee.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, he was glad the position of the coroners of Ireland had been brought under the consideration of the House, for it could not be denied that their present position was very unsatisfactory. He strongly objected to the abolition of the office, for it would be very hard to obtain another tribunal which would discharge the duties of the coroners in so just a manner. It had been recommended that the duties should be undertaken by unpaid magistrates; but that proposal had been tried in one county during the time the office of coroner was vacant, and had not been found to answer. The result was that the office had to be filled up. It would be a very hard matter to get two magistrates to come down and devote three or four hours, or, perhaps, two or three days, to holding an inquest. And if magistrates were appointed, he was convinced that they would demand from the Treasury a higher rate of payment than the coroners would receive. He also condemned the proposal, because, in the first place, the duties were of a judicial character, and should be discharged impartially; and, in the next, that those gentlemen were officials of the Government, and more or less under their influence. It was an office of great importance, and required to be filled by gentlemen of capacity and possessing an intimate knowledge of the country. He had heard no objections which would warrant hon. Members in opposing this measure. There was one portion of the Bill which he was afraid would inflict serious injury on some half-dozen coroners in Ireland. The Bill provided that coroners, on attaining the age of 70 years, should cease to hold office, and if they had served in the office for 20 years, they were to receive a pension. But those who had not served 20 years would not receive a pension, and therefore they would be deprived of their means of livelihood. He thought that would inflict a great hardship on those persons. He would suggest that the clause should be altered so as to provide that no coroner appointed in future should be allowed to hold the office after attaining the age of 70 years. Upon the whole, he thought that the objections taken by hon. Members to the Bill were such as could be easily dealt with in Committee.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN believed the present position of coroners in Ireland was exceedingly unsatisfactory, and for his own part he preferred their being paid by salary instead of by fees, which tended in many cases to improper and illegal practices. He objected, however, to the proposal of having resident magistrates appointed to the office, as being officials connected with the Government.

MR. BRUEN thought it was quite time that some such change as that proposed by the Bill was adopted, although some alterations might be required when the Bill got into Committee.

Mr. Gibson

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL thought from what he had heard said by hon. Members at both sides of the House that the office of coroner required some change. He would not abolish the functions of the coroner altogether, as it might be necessary on many occasions to hold a public inquiry. He should support the second reading. In Scotland there was nothing distinctly corresponding to a coroner's inquest, and there was some want of such an inquiry. The Procurator Fiscal was not a judicial functionary. He was the public prosecutor and the public prosecutor only. His inquiries were not of a public, but of a private character. No doubt, generally speaking, he performed his duties extremely well; but there was not the same satisfaction in the public mind that there would be, provided there was a public inquiry by a proper judicial officer. In Scotland he should be satisfied to entrust the inquiry to a sheriff.

MR. REDMOND was of opinion that it would be better to pay coroners by a fixed salary instead of fees. He should support the second reading of the Bill; but there were clauses in it which he should endeavour to alter in Committee.

MR. COLLINS was also of opinion that the Bill in many instances required to be considerably altered; but as that could only be done in Committee, he should reserve his objections until it went into Committee.

CAPTAIN NOLAN supported the second reading of the Bill, although there were clauses in it which he should endeavour to get altered in Committee. He was an advocate for the payment by salary and not by fees, and should have the expenses paid, one-half by the ratepayers, and the other by the Government.

MR. CHARLES LEWIS said, he was prepared to support the second reading of the Bill, on the condition that it should be referred to a Select Committee in order to put it into proper form. There were a number of changes proposed by the Bill, which were now suggested for the first time, which ought not to be accepted without careful inquiry, and he thought a Select Committee ought to be appointed to consider the subject. He believed the Bill as it stood would not be in the interest of the public service. Within the last few years the question of altering the mode of election and many of the incidents connected with the office of coroner had been the subject of Bills and Motions brought forward in that House. If legislation of a novel character was to take place in connection with the law and the office of coroner in one part of the United Kingdom, it must not be forgotten that it would have some effect upon the law and the office of coroner in other parts of the Kingdom. In many respects it was a very extraordinary Bill and required great attention on the part of the legal and medical Members of the House. It did not deal with a very important question—namely, the unseemly conflict between the magisterial bench and the Coroners' Court, which so often brought the administration of justice into contempt. This important incidental question was one which ought not to be omitted in any legislation on this question. This Bill for the first time defined and specified the qualification of coroners, it made an important change in the proceedings attending the election of coroner and it introduced a superannuation clause which had never before appeared in any Coroners' Bill. There was another provision in the Bill to which he objected, and which he was surprised had not provoked some comments from hon. Members opposite. It authorized the coroner before he had commenced the inquest, to commit persons to prison on mere suspicion. Then as to the appointment of deputies, the choice was limited to members of the legal and medical professions, and to that restriction he also objected. As to the payment of coroners by salaries, he was of opinion that in many cases it would not have so good an effect as payment by fees, inasmuch as it might induce these officers to neglect their duties. With respect to the superannuation clause, he thought it was a most extraordinary and unheard-of thing to propose that a public officer should be compelled to retire after attaining the age of 70 years. He ventured to assert that there was no precedent whatever for the insertion of a clause of that description. He thought if the Bill was intended to pass and to be of any practical use it could not be amended in Committee of the Whole House, but ought to be referred to a Select Committee.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he thought the debate had necessarily and very properly travelled somewhat beyond the points in which an amendment of the law was desired by the

coroners themselves. For many years the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney) had brought forward a Bill dealing with the duties, salary, and position of coroners; but that Bill had never got beyond the stage of second reading, because great doubt was entertained whether it was necessary to continue the office of coroner at all. There was great force in the argument of the right hon. and learned Member for Londonderry (Mr. Law) and other hon. Members who had dealt with the subject from this point of view. The case of Ireland was even stronger upon this point than the case of England or Wales, because in England there were no public prosecutors, whereas in Ireland there was a system of Crown prosecutors; and in England there were not, as there were in Ireland, stipendiary magistrates all over the country who might be entrusted with discharging another portion of the duties pertaining to the office of coroner. It was, however, an office of great antiquity; the persons appointed to hold it were elected by the people themselves, and he did not think, therefore, that any proposal to abolish the office of coroner or even to alter it in any essential character could be adopted by the Government, or would be assented to by the House of Commons. As, therefore, it would be admitted that the office should be retained, it was well to consider whether the law regulating it could not in some respects be improved; and the question was, whether that end was properly attained by the Bill. A Committee which sat some years ago on the Grand Jury laws in Ireland recommended that the appointment to the office of coroner should be vested in the magistrates or grand juries, subject to the approval of the Lord Lieutenant; but that was a proposal to which he could not agree. He would continue the office as it was, and the mode of election to it; for it should be borne in mind that the mode of election in Ireland was much more satisfactory than the English system. He observed the Bill made no provision for avoiding the conflicts which sometimes arose between coroners and the magisterial bench. Now, in any measure dealing with the authority of coroners that matter ought certainly to be considered. He looked upon the inquiry before the coroner as an inquiry rather into the cause of death, than into the guilt or innocence of any accused person; and he thought means were already provided for following up criminal inquiries without the aid of Coroners' Courts. It was proposed that coroners should be allowed to appoint deputies. On that point, he would only remark that in Ireland there were offices in which the appointment of deputies was a great public evil, and he did not wish to add to their number. The practice in itself was a bad and somewhat dangerous one, and the Bill did not sufficiently specify the circumstances under which deputies could be appointed or show how they were to be paid. The suggestion to make certain professional qualifications necessary for coroners was a wise provision; but he did not see any good reason for abolishing the existing property qualification. It was also a reasonable proposal that coroners should be paid by salary instead of by fees; but he objected to the high scale of fees on which the salaries were to be based, and thought it would require alteration in Committee. The Bill further proposed that coroners after 30 years' service should be at liberty to retire upon pensions. That was a proposal not founded upon the recommendations of the Committee on the Grand Jury Laws, who recommended that pensions should only be granted to officers who had devoted their whole time to the service of the country. It was a just principle — that officers who had served the public long and faithfully should be entitled to retire upon pensions: but there was considerable difficulty in applying it in the case of those whose public duties had occupied but a small part of their time. It was proposed that these pensions should be charged upon the fines inflicted for offences by Petty Sessions Courts; but that was a fund intended for the benefit of clerks of petty sessions, and he could not conceive anything more unfair than to draw upon a fund intended for such a purpose, and thus diminish a sum the application of which was an established rule. There was one clause in the Bill which proposed that coroners should be authorized to retire upon pensions, however short their service; but that was a proposal which he doubted would be accepted by the House. Nothing was said as to the limitation of age on appointment, and he thought that the clause relating to that matter would also require further consideration. On the part of the Government, he readily consented to the second reading, but considered the Bill would require a great deal of amending in Committee, and was, therefore, rather inclined to think it would be wise to adopt the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite and the hon. Member for Londonderry, and refer it to a Select Committee. He would, however, put himself in communication in the Whitsuntide Recess with authorities in Ireland on the subject of the measure; and he would now say, speaking for himself, that he would give his hearty support to the second reading.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday, 24th May.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE ACTS AMENDMENT BILL—[BILL 29.]

(Sir Henry Wolff, Sir Charles Legard, Sir Charles Russell, Mr. Callender, Mr. Ryder.)

SECOND READING. WITHDRAWAL OF BILL.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF, in moving that the Order for the second reading of the Bill be read and discharged, said, he had originally brought in the Bill thinking that it would be one of general convenience. Its only object was to simplify the borough registration, which was now very complicated and expensive. Objections having, however, been made to the Bill, he now asked permission of the House to withdraw it, that he might move for leave to introduce a short Bill to amend the state of the law in reference to a defect which was shown in Registration Courts to be cause of great annoyance and considerable curtailment of the franchise.

Motion agreed to.

Order read and discharged: Bill withdrawn.

HOUSE OCCUPIERS' DISQUALIFICATION REMOVAL BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to relieve certain Occupiers of Dwelling Houses from being disqualified from the right of voting in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament by reason of their underletting such Dwelling Houses for short terms, said, those persons paid the rates of the house during the time it was let—a time that they might have gone merely to a watering-place for the benefit of health and recreation; but as the law stood they were not considered occupiers, and they were consequently disfranchised. That was a state of the law which called for amendment, and he therefore hoped the House would give its consent to the introduction of the short Bill which he proposed to amend a defect which had been the cause of great annoyance, and which was a blot on the Parliamentary electoral system of the country.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID expressed his satisfaction at the course taken by the hon. Member for Christchurch in regard to the withdrawal of the first Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL concurred with the hon. Member who moved for leave to introduce the Bill that the law as it now stood was very defective in the manner he had pointed out, and called for amendment. Practically, persons who let their houses for a short time only paid all rates, and might be regarded as residents; but as the law stood they were subject to be disfranchised, if objection was made to their names being retained on the Register. He approved of the course which had been pursued by the hon. Member in withdrawing the former Bill on the subject, for, as it stood, he (the Solicitor General) would have felt himself bound to oppose it; whereas with regard to the one now substituted for it, he should be prepared to give it his support.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT agreed that the law required amendment in the manner proposed, and was also prepared to support such a Bill as that proposed by the hon. Member.

MR. FORSYTH thought that his hon. Friend who moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the law in the manner proposed had hit upon a blot in the Parliamentary electoral system. It was a great hardship to a man to be deprived of his right to vote during the ensuing year, because he had let his house during a short time that he might require to go out of town.

Motion agreed to.

Bill to relieve certain Occupiers of Dwelling Houses from being disqualified from the right of voting in the Election of Members to serve in Parliament by reason of their underletting such Dwelling Houses for short terms, ordered to be brought in by SIR HENRY WOLFF, SIR CHARLES LEGARD, SIR CHARLES RUSSELL, MR. CALLENDER, and MR. RYDER.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 164.]

INFANTICIDE BILL.—[BILL 43.]

(Mr. Charley, Mr. Whitwell.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CHARLEY, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that among the social questions pressing for a solution there were few of more importance than the question of amending the law relating to Infanticide. That was the third occasion on which he had brought the subject under the consideration of Parliament. An allegation was made last Session in "another place" that the Bill would have a tendency to diminish the security of infant life; but, on the contrary, its tendency would be to increase the security of infant life. That the Bill had been introduced on behalf of the Infant Life Protection Society ought in itself to be a sufficient answer to so absurd a charge. The new offence created by the measure, which stood midway between murder and concealment of birth, occupied, as Mr. Justice Willes stated in his evidence before the Capital Punishment Commission in 1866, the same relation to murder that treason-felony occupied to treason. The 6th clause was copied from the Treason-Felony Act. Would anybody assert that the Treason-Felony Act had lessened the securities of the Crown against High Treason? On the contrary, it had strengthened those securities by ensuring convictions at the hands of juries, who would have acquitted the prisoner, if proceeded against for the capital offence. If juries were reluctant to expose a traitor to the death penalty, was it surprising that juries hesitated to find a verdict of guilty of wilful murder against the mother of an illegitimate child, in whose breast the instincts of a mother's love had been stifled by her dread of the scorn of a cruel world, and especially of the virtuous of her own sex? So far from blaming juries for invariably acquitting the mother, they would be less than men, if they did not do it. The 3rd, 4th, and 5th clauses of the Bill were founded on the recommendations of the Capital Punishment Commissioners of 1866, who, in their Report, said—

"Our attention has been called to the frequent failures of justice in cases of Infanticide. The crime of Infanticide, as distinguished from murder in general, is not known to the English law. The moment a child is born alive it is as much under the protection of the law as an adult. We have considered whether the failure of justice which undoubtedly often occurs in such cases may not be obviated by some change in the law which shall add to the protection of new-born children. The principal obstacle, which now prevents the due enforcement of the law, is the extreme difficulty of giving positive proof that the child, alleged to have been murdered, was completely born alive. We have given this important and difficult subject our serious attention and we have arrived at the opinion, that an Act should be passed, making it an offence, punishable with penal servitude or imprisonment, at the discretion of the Court, unlawfully and maliciously to inflict grievous bodily harm or serious injury upon a child during its birth or within seven days afterwards, in case such child has subsequently died. No proof that the child was completely born alive should be required. With respect to the offence of concealment of birth, we think that no person should be liable to be convicted of such offence upon an indictment for murder, but should be tried upon a separate indictment. The accused should not be entitled to be acquitted in either of the above cases, if it should be proved on the trial that the offence amounted to murder or manslaughter."

In the composition of that Commission he saw the names of four Members of the present Cabinet—the Duke of Richmond, the Earl of Derby, Mr. Gathorne Hardy, and Mr. Ward Hunt. Their Report was founded on the evidence of distinguished Judges who were examined before them. Of those Judges he might mention the names of Lord Cranworth, Mr. Baron Martin, Lord Wensleydale, Mr. Justice Willes, and the Lord Chief Baron, Sir FitzRoy Kelly. The late Mr. Justice Willes, in his evidence, said—

"I think that the present law certainly is in a very bad state. I think that a great many children meet with foul play under circumstances in which no sentence or adequate sentence can be passed upon the mother. I am obliged to come to the conclusion that a great many women kill their children in the course of birth, or soon afterwards, with a view to conceal the fact that they have had them, and they get off now altogether in cases where it appears that there has been no concealment of the dead body, so as to be a misdemeanor."

The Chairman, the Duke of Richmond, said—

"I do not understand you to propose any alteration in the law as it at present stands, to meet those difficulties which you yourself have mentioned?—I think that there ought to be an alteration in the law. I should propose a separate Act of Parliament upon the principle of the Treason Felony Act."

"MR. EWART: An Infanticide Act?—I would take away all the anomaly which belongs to the case at present. I do not think that the acts against procuring miscarriage meet the point.

it is not a case of abortion, it is the case of a full-grown child; it is not to produce a birth before the natural time. I think that you must have a distinct Act of Parliament; it would be nothing new in principle."

Sir Samuel Martin, in his evidence, said—

"There is certainly one case of murder, which is probably the most common case which occurs, and that is child murder; I would certainly suggest that an alteration be made in the law with respect to the child being completely born. . . . Any Judge who pleases can at once get an acquittal for a murder of that sort. It is almost impossible to tell whether the wound was given before the child was separated from the mother or afterwards; there are no means of getting at it, and if you suggest to the counsel for the prosecution, 'Have you any means of showing that this wound was inflicted after the child was separated from the mother,' the counsel says 'No,' and there is an end of it; that is not a very satisfactory state of the law."

"Mr. HARDY: You think that there should be some intermediate offence between murder and concealment of birth?—Yes."

"Mr. HUNT: Making it immaterial whether the child was completely born or not?—Yes; I think that some punishment short of death should be provided for that offence."

"Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND: Do you mean for infanticide generally, or for infanticide in the act of birth?—In the act of birth; an infant is found just as it is born with some wound, and no one can doubt that it was inflicted by the mother, but cannot tell whether it was inflicted before or after its complete separation from her."

When he (Mr. Charley) first introduced a Bill to amend the law on the subject, in 1873, it was read a second time; and when he introduced it the second time, in 1874, it was read a second time and referred to the Select Committee on the Homicide Law Amendment Bill of the Recorder of London, by which Committee it was amended in a manner of which he (Mr. Charley) disapproved. The Bill went up to the House of Lords, where it was read a second time; but it was subsequently thrown out on the Motion for going into Committee—the Bill that was thrown out, he would observe, not being his Bill, but the Bill which the Select Committee had made it. The principle of his Bill was supported by Mr. Justice Blackburn, in his evidence before the Homicide Committee. The Bill proposed to give power to treat infanticide as a simple felony, punishable with penal servitude or imprisonment, instead of as at present compelling prosecutors to proceed against mothers who destroyed their new-born offspring for the capital offence. He did not propose to make any alterations in the existing law; but simply to create a new offence and give an alternative mode of procedure. The Bill did not deal with the question of murder. Dr. Neilson Hancock, in his Judicial Statistics, 1873, p. 23, observed—

"The statistics of infanticide in England and Ireland are quite startling. The proportion of children in Ireland to the rest of the population was ascertained by the Census Commissioners in 1861 to be as 2·4 to 97·6, or, in other words, that in every 200 of the population about five are infants under one year of age. It follows from this that the proportional number of infants under one year of age which would correspond to the 23 murders which appear from the Coroner's returns to have taken place amongst the rest of the population in Ireland would be about 0·6 a-year, or 6 in 10 years. The actual number of infanticides is therefore 28 times the number of murders occurring amongst the same amount of the population at other periods of life. In England and Wales the actual number would appear to be on an average 50 times the number occurring amongst the same number of the population at other periods of life. In Ireland 106 persons were committed for trial for infanticide. So strongly, however, does the feeling against capital punishment operate, that there was not a single conviction for murder, and 39 were acquitted. If the punishment were more in accordance with public opinion, the prosecutions and convictions would be more frequent, and the excessive number of infanticides would be more effectually checked."

The question had now been in abeyance for nine years; the mind of the public was now completely seized of the subject; and he hoped, in consideration of its great importance and urgency, the House would consent to the Bill being now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Charley.)

MR. MORGAN LLOYD thought the Bill ought not to be read a second time without some discussion, and expressed his objection to the principle of the Bill, which proposed to make, what in another person was wilful murder, a simple felony punishable by 10 years penal servitude when committed by a mother upon her own child. The Bill defined an offence which amounted to murder, and proposed to enact that it should not be murder but a minor offence. As the Bill was framed, a jury, in order to convict of the new offence, must find that the mother "wilfully and maliciously inflicted bodily injury causing the death" of the infant—or, in other words, they must find that she had committed wilful murder. He would suggest the omission of the words “thereby causing death,” which would remove the objection.

MR. CHARLEY explained that his Bill did not touch the law relating to murder, but gave the prosecutor the choice of proceeding for murder or for the new offence created by the Bill.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, if the Bill of the hon. and learned Member passed, juries must either find the prisoner indicted under the 3rd clause, guilty of felony, which would subject her to penal servitude for 10 years, or acquit her altogether; and as a consequence of the latter, she could not be indicted a second time if further evidence were obtained to support a charge of murder or manslaughter. He hoped it would not go forth that by British legislation that which would be murder in any other woman would not be considered murder in a mother. He trusted that his hon. and learned Friend, if the Bill be now read a second time, would bear his suggestions for its amendment in mind.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT said, that amongst all the reforms which had taken place in the criminal law, no attempt had been made to deal with this important matter, which circumstance showed the difficulty of dealing with it. The Bill did not alter the definition of murder, but made the crime with which it dealt different from what it had been up to the present time. For himself, he considered the life of an infant of as great importance to the State as that of any grown person. Much had been done by Lord Romilly and other distinguished men to bring about a reform of the law in relation to capital punishment, which was now only mercifully retained in few and exceptional cases. The Bill proposed to make a difference only in cases where the child at the moment of birth, or within a very short period after that event, was supposed to have lost its life by the act of the mother; but, in cases of unassisted birth, children were in great danger of losing their lives without any guilt on the part of the mother. It might be said that an alteration of the law might increase the crime of infanticide; but, to his mind, it would not have any such effect, and juries would not then hesitate to find verdicts according to the evidence, and the certainty of punishment that would follow would have a deterrent effect, and give more security to preservation of infant life.

MR. COLE said, the cases which the Bill of the hon. and learned Member proposed to deal with had become a disgrace to the law of the country. There was not a circuit at which women were not indicted for the alleged crime of infanticide; and in these cases there was almost a moral certainty of the woman being acquitted by the jury. The principal reason was that juries would not convict when they knew that the extreme penalty of the law was to be carried out for the offence committed. The great thing in legislation of this kind was to see that the punishment should be certain. There was not a known instance—certainly for many years past—in which a woman who had been convicted of infant murder had suffered the extreme penalty of the law. Therefore, there ought to be an alteration in the law. This Bill created a new offence, for which the person on conviction would receive a very commensurate punishment. Though this new offence was created, the old offence of murder still remained. There might be some of these offences of so bad a character that the persons would be indicted under the old indictment for murder, and there was nothing in this Bill to hinder it being done. The effect of the 3rd section of this Bill would be to obtain more convictions, and with this certainty the result would naturally be further protection for the child. The ablest Judges in the land had all pronounced against the present law. One of the greatest difficulties in the conviction of women as the law now stood was that the child must have had an independent or separate existence from the mother before the wound had been inflicted that caused the death. The great defence always set up by a skilful counsel was that the child had had no separate or independent existence, that it was not completely born, and possessed no independent circulation. This Bill did away with that absurd distinction, and the person who caused the death of a child would be convicted without reference to whether the child had attained a separate existence. The Bill would meet the difficulties of the case, and be a most valuable measure.

MR. EVANS, having been a Member of the Committee referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman, considered the proposal contained in his Bill to alter and amend the law necessary, and he hoped the measure would not be defeated. As the law now stood juries would not convict of murder. He thought that the measure would tend to the preservation of life, and, seeing that a change in the law was necessary, he should give his vote for the second reading.

MR. KNIGHT said, that when the Act of Elizabeth with reference to bastardy was altered, those who opposed the alteration had prophesied that infanticide would become more common, from the difficulty that had been thrown upon the poor unfortunate woman to prove the paternity of her offspring. Their idea had been fully borne out, and, so far from passing this measure, which he thought would have the effect of legalizing murders of this kind, he trusted that the House would rather return to the old law with reference to the subject, during the existence of which infanticide was almost unknown. Were the law restored to its original state she could establish a claim for the support of the child upon the putative father, or else upon the parish.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, the question was whether infanticide was to be committed with impunity, as it was under the present law. Speaking with the experience of a Judge who had been for many years engaged in the administration of the criminal law, he attributed the failure of justice in cases of infanticide to the difficulty of proving that the infant had ever a separate existence from the mother. This Bill met that case by providing a penalty for any violence done to a child, either before its birth, or in the course of its birth, and was so far a valuable improvement of the present law.

MR. WHALLEY considered that a Bill of such importance as the one now before the House should not have been introduced by a private Member, but should come before them on the Government of the country.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he should not give his support to the Bill if he thought it would facilitate infanticide. He believed the Bill would do nothing of the sort. When a woman was indicted for the murder of her child it was almost impossible to obtain a conviction, because, according to the law of this country a child could not be held to be murdered, unless it could be proved that there was an independent circulation in the child and that it had been completely born into the world; and it was very difficult to obtain medical or other testimony on the subject. Therefore, a Bill of this sort was necessary, and it would effect, in his opinion, a very just and desirable alteration of the law. Instead of encouraging the commission of the crime of infanticide, he believed it would greatly deter women from the commission of that crime, and for that reason he should support it. He must, however, draw the attention of the hon. and learned Member for Salford to the fact that under the Bill, an accessory to the infliction of a malicious wound upon a child could not be punished. It was not desirable that such a result as that should occur. In the Bill introduced by the hon. and learned Member in 1873, the indictment was not restricted to the mother of the child. But he could not find fault with the hon. and learned Member, because he had drawn the Bill in conformity with the language of the Select Committee to whom the Bill was referred.

SIR HENRY JAMES said, the general opinion of the House evidently was, that the Bill should be read a second time, and the criticisms offered upon it were rather matters for consideration in Committee. One of the advantages of the Bill was, that it would meet the practical evil arising from the fact that when a woman was indicted for the murder of her child, there was often so much sympathy with her in her peculiar circumstances that juries refused to convict, and she was subsequently acquitted as if entirely innocent. There were one or points in which the Bill might be advantageously amended in Committee; but with that reservation, he was of opinion that the measure, supported as it was by the practical experience of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Recorder of London, was one which it was desirable to pass.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time and committed for Friday, 28th May.

TOWNS RATING (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. Butt, Sir Joseph M'Kenna, Mr. Bryan, Mr. Ronayne.)

[BILL 139.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BUTT, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he felt some surprise at hearing that the measure was to be opposed; and as he had no doubt the opposition to it originated in a thorough misconception of its provisions, he would now attempt to explain what was the real object of the Bill. Its real object was simply to remove a great hindrance which existed in the way of those who were entitled to the franchise obtaining the exercise of it, and to put it on the same footing as it was in England. That being the object of the measure, he hoped that, considering the number of days they had spent in providing for Ireland a measure of coercion, they would not hesitate to send after it this measure of enfranchisement to serve as a kind of equivalent. The Bill only proposed to deal with the question of rates. In Ireland the franchise depended upon two conditions. The first was, that the property out of which the vote was claimed should be rated to the poor; and, secondly, that the occupier himself should be rated. In some parts of Ireland it was the custom for the landlords to pay all the rates and taxes, and therefore the occupiers were not rated, and, as a consequence, could not vote. They certainly had a remedy for this, but it was a very cumbrous and inconvenient one. For instance, an occupier who wished to be placed upon the electoral roll might make an application to be rated; but then the application had to be accompanied by a tender of all the rates due up to the date of his making the application. To say the least, it was very unjust that they should have to pay those arrears, whether they arose in the qualifying year or not. In the case of England, in 1869, when they had to consider the case of that troublesome gentleman "the compound householder," Mr. Jacob Bright introduced and carried a measure, providing that the man formerly liable for the rates, although another paid them, should be put in possession of the franchise; and the only and sole object of this Bill was to assimilate the law of Ireland to the law of England in that respect.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Butt.)

MR. VANCE, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, that although the hon. and learned Gentleman professed that it only dealt with the question of rating, it led up directly to a municipal and Parliamentary reform in Ireland, and would place the franchise in the possession of those who paid 5s. or 10s. in the way of rates. ["No, no!"] Well, if that was not its object, it had no object at all. If the hon. Member's object was to place on the registry men who were owners, and were qualified for being rated above £4, he could have gone about it in a much simpler manner, and in a much shorter Bill; but household suffrage, and not that, was his object. He had brought that question distinctly forward in a Bill which he had withdrawn; but this Bill was introduced to effect the same purpose in a covert way. It was, in fact, a new Reform Bill, which, if introduced at all, should be brought forward on the responsibility of the Government.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Vance.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA supported the Bill, and hoped the House would not be induced by anything which had fallen from the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. Vance) to reject this measure, which was a simple endeavour to render the law in Ireland as regarded the franchise the same as it was in England. If, while the scope of the Bill was such as to meet with general approval, there were any matters of detail open to objection, those could be attended to in Committee. Certainly, the objection to the Bill that it was one which ought to proceed from the Government, and not from a private Member, came with a very bad grace from the hon. Member for Armagh, who had himself occupied so much of the Sitting with a measure introduced on his own responsibility, dealing with one of the most ancient institutions of the country—the jurisdiction of coroners—nor was it constitutionally necessary that all such measures should originate with the Administration. This measure was not in any respect a sweeping and radical measure, but simply one of common justice.

MR. GOSCHEN supported the principle of the Bill, which he thought should meet with the unanimous favour of the House, inasmuch as it was simply to confer the same rights upon the towns of Ireland as had been given to those of England.

MR. MULHOLLAND supported the Amendment. If it were a mere measure of rating, no one would object to the Bill; but they had to read between the lines for its real object, and that was to carry under the guise mentioned by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick both an electoral and municipal Reform Act for Ireland. Seven out of the eight clauses of this Bill were copied verbatim from the Borough Franchise Bill, which had been introduced early this Session by the hon. Member, and thus withdrawn to make room for the present Bill. Unless it were the intention to follow up this Bill by another Bill, conferring the franchise upon all ratepayers, it had no meaning. If this were done, the result would be that, in some of the boroughs, the result would be that the new voters would outnumber the present constituents from two to one to three to one. He had never heard of any complaints against the existing state of affairs, and he objected to passing such provisions under the title of a Towns Rating Bill. They had lately passed a Bill which would for a time secure peace to Ireland, and he hoped that peace would not be disturbed by this kind of political agitation.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, he accepted the assurance of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Limerick that this measure was not intended to cover a new Irish Reform Bill, but was simply to remedy the grievance that persons otherwise entitled to the franchise should be excluded from it merely on account of the omission of their names from the list of ratepayers. He had listened with attention to the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman; but had not heard him cite a single instance in which this grievance was felt. Certainly, no complaint of the kind had reached the House, and on reference to Sir Alfred Power, who was Vice President of the Local Government Board in Ireland, he found that no complaints whatever had been made to the Local Government Board upon this subject. Already ample provision had been made by which, in case of the omission of the names of occupiers entitled to be rated above or below £4, their names might be inserted in the rate-book. They might claim to be rated, and if any clerk of a Union wilfully neglected his duty in that respect he was subject to dismissal. He could not, therefore, support a Bill of this kind without the proof of some grievance it was intended to remedy.

MR. CALLAN said, that in his own town (Dundalk) 15 names were omitted, and he attributed the opposition he met with at the last Election to the fact—

And it being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that when he gave Notice of his intention to move that evening the adjournment of the House for the Whitsuntide Recess, he was not aware that the Peace Preservation (Ireland) Bill would come before their Lordships' House so soon as it had done. Their Lordships were aware of the necessity that the Bill should pass into a law as rapidly as possible, and therefore if their Lordships should that night assent to the second reading—as he anticipated they would—he would then ask their Lordships to take the Committee and the third reading to-morrow, so that the Bill might go through the remaining stages before the Recess. Many noble Lords, however, had made arrangements on the supposition that the Adjournment would take place that night, and therefore it might be inconvenient for their Lordships to meet at 5 p.m. This being so, he would, if it should meet with the wishes of the House, move the Adjournment until 2 o'clock to-morrow, instead of the usual hour of 5 o'clock.

VISCOUNT CARDWELL said, his noble Friend Lord Granville, who was unable to be in his place that evening, had asked him to say that he thought the arrangement suggested by the noble Duke was a desirable one under the circumstances.

POLLUTION OF RIVERS BILL.—(No. 81.)
(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that, as that measure was of very considerable importance, he ventured to think it deserved to receive careful consideration before it became the law of the land. The time had passed when the necessity for legislation on this subject was disputed; but the subject was one of great complexity and great difficulty, and the Bill before their Lordships would affect a very large number of manufactories, and consequently very large manufacturing and commercial interests. Therefore, although he did not underrate the importance of improving the state of our rivers, yet their Lordships must not lose sight of the fact that any legislation would affect most materially a vast amount of industry. The Bill had been only a very short time before the country. It had only been distributed to their Lordships on Saturday last. He did not ask for a postponement of the second reading; but he would suggest that those who would be so much affected by the enactments of the Bill, should have an opportunity of expressing their opinions before the Committee was taken. This Bill differed very much from other Bills that had been laid before Parliament. In the Bill of 1873 no fewer than 10 different tests were set out, and that Bill would have enacted that no liquid which did not satisfy those tests should be allowed to flow into any river. The noble Marquess who had charge of the charge of the Bill now before their Lordships (the Marquess of Salisbury) had shown by experiments made at Hatfield one rainy day last year, that those tests were too delicate and too unwieldy to be embodied in a Bill. This Bill went to the other extreme, and proposed to deal with the question in an heroic fashion. It dispensed altogether with chemical tests, and made the common sense of the County Court Judge the only test as to what was "filthy, noxious, or polluting." He spoke with all respect of the County Court Judges, but, originally, they were legal functionaries appointed to preside over Courts for the recovery of small debts. No doubt they had a fair share of common sense; but common sense was not such a common commodity as it was generally supposed to be. Practically, this Bill would give the County Court Judges control over manufacturing interests of the greatest importance; and, without any definition in the Bill to guide them, manufacturers might be put to a very large outlay by order of a County Court Judge. He ventured to think there would be a great deal of difference in the rulings of County Court Judges as to what would constitute an offence under the Bill, and he would point out that there was no appeal from his decision. Indeed, he would go further, and say that even in their Lordships' House there would be found various opinions as to what was pollution to a stream. In the Report of Dr. Franklin and Mr. Morton it was said—

"It is of the first importance, in carrying out any legislative enactment in connection with river pollution, that all river basins be uniformly dealt with. This has again and again been urged upon us by representatives of the staple manufacturers on the Mersey and Ribble basins. They state, and we think with reason, that it would be unfair, for example, to the calico printers of Lancashire to have a law stringently enforced against them, while in another river basin their competitors in trade were being treated with comparative leniency and indulgence."

In their evidence before the Committee of their Lordships' House scientific witnesses showed that they were not agreed on the point. Manufacturers did not know how to act; and if the County Court Judge called in the aid of experts their Lordships knew how conflicting were likely to be the opinions he would hear stated. He did not mean to assert that scientific witnesses were unduly biased on the side for which they appeared; but all of their Lordships who had served on Committees knew that the evidence of such witnesses when examined on the one side and the other, was usually to leave the Committee in the position in which it stood when the inquiry commenced, and to put out of its power any attempt to reconcile the conflicting scientific opinions. The Report of the Committee of their Lordships' House stated—

"Two sets of experts usually come to opposite conclusions, and, instead of helping the tribunal before whom they appear to form a sound judgment, they only increase its embarrassment, and the general result is either that the Court, rejecting altogether the conflicting scientific evidence, arrives at what it considers a common-sense conclusion, or by some ingenious and fallacious process contrives to twist the discordant statements sufficiently into harmony to afford some justification for conclusions thus apparently based upon them."

He had said so much, not by way of opposition to the second reading of the Bill, but to point out the necessity of giving full time for a consideration of the Bill and an examination of the proposal to leave so much to the County Court Judge.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, that the object of the Bill was a very good one, but he could not conceal from himself that there would be very great difficulty in carrying it into effect. He had great experience with respect to the pollution of the rivers in Scotland, but he thought it would be very objectionable, if, merely because the manufacturers had been in the habit of polluting the rivers for upwards of 12 years, they should obtain the prescriptive right to continue to do so, merely by showing that they had taken some steps to prevent such pollution, and that these were the best means which they could adopt for the purpose. In Scotland it had been ruled that however long a person had possessed a manufactory, and had polluted the river, it gave him no prescriptive right to continue to do so. He did not think that the provisions of the measure generally were stringent enough, because there was no one appointed to put the law in motion. He thought it would be better if they appointed Inspectors—something in the character of Inspectors of Nuisances—who should examine the water, and on finding it polluted have the power of bringing the manufacturer before the County Court Judge—in other words, who should fulfil the office of public prosecutor. The rivers in Scotland were polluted to an enormous extent, and for a considerable distance from many towns the water of the rivers was altogether unfit for domestic purposes. In some parts of the Tweed it appeared bright and sparkling enough, and emitted nothing whatever offensive to the smell, but nevertheless, when taken up, it was found to be as black as any of their Lordships' coats. Such a state of things ought never to be continued, and he was therefore desirous that the Bill should be amended in the sense of making it more stringent.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE understood that the main objection to the state of the law as it now stood was its uncertainty, and the indefiniteness of the offence it was intended to punish. He would like to consider the provisions of the Bill from that point of view, because he thought that if they could pass an Act making clear what constituted the offence, that Act would be accepted by manufacturers and by the corporations of towns with great readiness; but if it failed in that point, it would encounter great resistance. Now, the Bill of Her Majesty's Government differed in several respects from any previous attempts in this direction. There was, in the first place, the constitution of the County Court Judge as the tribunal before whom these cases were to be tried. With regard to this point, his noble Friend (the Earl of Morley) had well pointed out the dangers which were likely to arise from leaving so much to the judgment of the County Court Judge. Then there was the substitution of the noble Marquess' common-sense test for the chemical tests upon which previous legislation had relied. He was bound to say that, whilst something was to be said against the chemical tests, a good deal was also to be said against anything which could be put in their place. It was quite true that chemical tests, if embodied in a Bill, would be likely to break down in some cases; but scientific men were almost unanimously of opinion that some kind of test should be adopted, and it was the opinion of almost all the men of science whose opinions had been laid before the River Pollution Commission that tests were practicable. Professor Frankland stated before the House of Lords' Committee that—

“There is actually no definite line of demarcation separating the purest spring water from the filthiest sewage; it, therefore, appears obvious that for the purposes of efficient legislation such a line, though an arbitrary one, must be drawn between waters which were to be deemed polluting and inadmissible into streams, and such as should be considered innocuous, and therefore admissible into running water; it would thus become easy on the one hand to convict careless or reckless corporations or manufacturers, and on the other, which is equally important, to protect them from the incessant and uncertain litigation that must ensue if no definition of polluting liquids were adopted; hence arose the necessity for the standards of pollution suggested by the Commissioners: the standards of pollution represent, in a concentrated form, the experience of the present Rivers Pollution Commission, acquired by the incessant investigation for five years of the chief manufacturing purposes carried on in this country.”

He had read a very important statement to the same effect by Mr. J. Chalmers Morton—

“Without tests it was impossible that justice should invariably be done, for these standards were as necessary for the protection of the innocent as for the easy conviction of the guilty. At present, if you go before a Court with your complaint in general terms of the nuisance by which you are aggrieved you are certain to be met by evidence, also in general terms, that the thing is not so bad as you declared it, or that there is really no nuisance at all; or that if there be any discomfort it is as nothing compared with the tenfold injury which would be inflicted on one hundredfold the number of sufferers if any injunction should be issued; and what was a distracted jury, or even a clear-sighted Judge, to do for either complainant or defendant in the face of contradictory evidence, both lay and scientific, so long as both are allowed the resources of the English language with which to attack or defend?”

He could not but regard that testimony as of great importance. As showing the difficulties which would have to be encountered in the working of the Bill, he would direct attention to the 3rd clause, which stated that—

“Every person who causes to fall or flow, or knowingly permits to fall or flow or to be carried into any stream any solid or liquid sewage matter, shall be deemed to commit an offence against this Act.”

Now, it would be impossible for the manager of a sewage farm—and this Bill appeared to contemplate sewage farms as the obvious remedy for the existing condition of things—to avoid doing what that clause prohibited. Again, by Clauses 4 and 5 anyone who, after the passing of this Bill, should knowingly cause or permit to fall or flow any filthy, noxious, poisonous, or polluting liquid proceeding from any factory or manufacturing process, or from any mine, into any stream should be deemed to commit an offence against the Act. A person who had been acting in that way for a period of less than 12 years preceding the passing of the Act was to be allowed two years after the passing of the Act, or such further period as the Local Government Board might allow, before he could be deemed to have committed such offence, and then he was to be subject to all the pains and penalties of the Bill; but a person who for a period of 12 years or more preceding the passing of the Act had been acting in that way was not at any time to be deemed to commit an offence against the Act, if he proved that he had used, and continued to use, the best practicable and available means to detain or render harmless the pollution. Now, if a man had taken and was continuing to take the best practicable and available means of purifying the offensive liquid, he could not see what difference two, five, ten, or twelve years' usage should make in the case. The proposal in the Bill appeared to him to be "prescription run mad," and he ventured to hope that the noble Marquess would reconsider his proposal, at all events in this respect. He had heard with great satisfaction from the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) that the drainage of a district was not to be a matter for the local authorities; but unless the local authority took action under the provisions of the Bill, he should like to know who else was likely to do so? In fact, what it would come to was this—that the duty of giving effect to this Bill would fall upon the medical officer of each district. The duties of the County Court Judge had been multiplied by recent legislation, but the case of the County Court Judge was nothing to that of the sanitary officer, upon whom every fresh Act of Parliament cast new responsibilities. As their Lordships knew, that officer was in many instances the doctor in a small country town. Often he was not very liberally paid for what he did as Officer of Health, and in many instances—as shown by a Return which he held in his hand—he was allowed private practice; and therefore did not give his whole time to the duties of his office. He could draw only one conclusion from the difficulties which presented themselves, and it was this—that in order to successfully grapple with the subject, a wider and more comprehensive scheme of local government must necessarily be established, and he regretted that before bringing in this measure the Government had not addressed themselves to reforming the local government of the country.

LORD ABERDARE said, he was aware that the subject with which the Government proposed to deal by this Bill was a most difficult one, but he thought the Bill failed to meet it. He concurred with his noble Friend who had just spoken (the Marquess of Lansdowne) in thinking there was no good reason for the prescriptive advantage proposed to be given to those manufacturers who had been polluting rivers for 12 years. He was of opinion that the pollution of rivers could not be effectively dealt with unless in other great manufacturing towns the course taken in the metropolis were adopted. He referred to the construction of a great central sewer to carry off the drainage of a large district to one appointed place. He could hardly think that the point had escaped the noble Marquess; but he did not observe that sufficient provision for the purpose was made in the Bill. He concurred with his noble Friend (the Earl of Morley) who had pointed out the embarrassment likely to arise from conflicting decisions of County Court Judges; and it appeared to him that competent persons to supervise districts should be appointed by the Government in order to secure uniformity in the working of the measure.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he did not object to the criticisms on the Bill, nor was he at all surprised at them; but he would ask their Lordships to consider what they had to do—what was the problem they had to solve. On the one side, the rivers had been so absolutely polluted that the rights of the riparian owners had been virtually ousted and destroyed. The owners lower down a stream had had from all time the right to use the water for themselves and their animals—the right to have it in a state in which it could be used. Consequently, they had the right that it should not be made noxious by those who dwelt higher up. On the other hand, the owners of great pecuniary interests—extensive manufacturers employing large numbers of people and carrying on manufactories essential to the prosperity of the country—had set up their works all along those streams. These were vast interests which neither our sense of justice nor our Parliamentary power would enable us to disregard.

But that was not the only difficulty. It was to be borne in mind that Parliament took a bold step some years ago in the matter of drainage. Without inquiring too curiously what would be the effect to individual interests, it directed that the work should be done—they imposed on the local authorities the duty of draining towns and other places inhabited by large communities. The Government therefore had to deal with very complicated local governments and with people jealous of their rights and interests. What was to be done in this dilemma was a matter which could only be settled by arrangement. Undoubtedly there were difficulties which must be encountered by those who undertook to legislate on the subject of the Pollution of Rivers—they were difficulties inseparable from the constitution of the country. He could not concur with those noble Lords who had said that they saw no reason for the distinction which the Bill made between persons who had been polluting a stream for 12 years and those who had commenced to do so within a more recent period. If a man came to establish himself on the land of another person, he was a wrong doer, and that other person could at once drive him out; but if the man had been 12 years established on the land, that other person could not drive him out. He knew there was no legal parallel between that case and the case provided for in the Bill, but there was a moral parallel between them. He thought that if manufacturers had been allowed to go on pursuing a certain process for many years, and Parliament suddenly interfered to solve a problem, that solution ought to be sought for with some consideration for those manufacturers. As to what had been said about the local authorities being left to set the Bill in motion, he thought the noble Duke (the Duke of Buccleuch) had not a clear apprehension of the proposal—he seemed to think that only the local authorities had power to set the Act in motion. No doubt had that been so it would have been a defect in the Bill; but he would point out that the Local Government Board was charged with the performance of the duty in case the local authorities had failed to perform it; so that a responsible Minister of the Government would have to see that effect was given to the provisions of the Bill. He quite agreed with what the noble Lord (Lord Aberdare) had said as to the importance of bringing the Bill to bear on a large area; and that, he apprehended, was the object of providing for Conservancy Boards in the way proposed by the Bill. There was, however, one point in respect of which he admitted the Bill was defective. As the Bill stood it did not confer sufficient power on Conservancy Boards to construct large drains in the centres of districts. He thought they could do this only by means of Private Bills, and when this Bill went down to the Commons it might be expedient to provide means for the Conservancy Boards to promote Private Bills for that purpose. As to the objections urged against the jurisdiction proposed to be given to the County Court Judges, in the first place, the Judges of the Superior Courts were already overworked. The County Court Judge was at once the Judge nearest to the locality and the Judge with the most time. To say that questions such as would arise under this Bill must be dealt with by Courts of great authority and not by the County Courts was to say that they must be brought to London—a proceeding which would be ruinous to the suitor and ruinous to the Bill itself. As to tests, if satisfactory tests could be embodied in the Bill, that, no doubt, would be a convenient and satisfactory arrangement; but he did not think they could be. The test of colour would be erroneous; the test of suspended matter would be futile, because it would always be found in an agricultural district after a heavy fall of rain; and as to the test of organic nitrogen, while there was still a dispute about it on a matter of scientific fact it would be going rather far to embody it in the Bill. But he did not think there would be that difficulty in coming to a decision which some noble Lords seemed to apprehend. They were only now dealing with the pollution of water; but it was a long time back since they commenced to deal with the pollution of air, and people who had noses had proved to be well able, by the old and well-known process, to decide what was a stink. In the same way he believed the County Court Judge would be able to decide, by common sense, what was the pollution of a river. It was for the persons who were affected by the pollution to say whether the water was pure or not, and for the Court to decide and say what was to be done. We should not be able to do altogether without experts, but he hoped we should have as little as possible to do with them. Their opinions were weakened by the very accuracy and minuteness of their scientific knowledge. He did not pretend that a perfect remedy would be provided by this Bill. It was a tentative effort. He believed the Government were going as far as they could go in the matter, and that the Bill would effect a marked improvement in respect of the many evils complained of. If that improvement should prove not to be sufficient, it would be competent to Parliament, by means of future legislation, to again take the grievance in hand and have recourse to further means to remove it. It was, in his judgment, the wiser course for the Government to move by slow steps, and not attempt to go too far.

LORD SELBORNE said, that the discussion their Lordships had heard that evening showed the truth of the observations of his noble Friend (the Earl of Morley), that this was a Bill which ought not to be passed before time had been given to the great interests which it would affect to carefully consider its provisions. He had himself great difficulty in understanding what would be the operation of the Bill, and that difficulty had not been diminished—on the contrary, it had been increased—by the speech of his noble Friend who had just sat down (the Marquess of Salisbury). The noble Marquess did not appear to understand, as well as he might have been expected to do, some parts of his own Bill; because he first argued that prescriptive rights were not given to certain persons by Clauses 4 and 5 of the Bill, and then he went on to say that, of course, it was necessary to show some respect for vested interests. The real difficulty which presented itself in connection with the words of those clauses was to say whether they did save any interests; and if they did, whether they did not save a great deal more than his noble Friend intended them to save. In the first place, even the person who had caused pollution for 12 years or more was required to show that he had used, and continued to use, the best procurable and available means to “detain or render harmless” the polluting liquid, so that it should not flow into the stream. If these words were to be read as requiring him to “detain” by the best available means, unless there were some available means of rendering the liquid harmless, this was not a matter of science; everybody could detain a liquid, in the sense of not letting it run into a stream. But, in that case, there was no greater tenderness shown to those who had polluted for 12 years, than to those who might only have begun their pollution yesterday. The distinction was illusory; and every man who could not purify the liquid must detain it, though at the expense, possibly, of the destruction of his business. On the other hand, if a man who had for 12 years polluted a stream, was meant to be at liberty to go on doing so, if he could show that there were no better means available than those which he was actually using, either to purify or to detain it, consistently with carrying on his business, this would operate in a direction exactly the contrary of that desired by the noble Duke opposite. He (Lord Selborne) did not see how it would be possible to get rid of scientific tests and the evidence of experts when the question was whether the best and most practical means had been used to render the sewage harmless. The hearing of such cases in the County Courts would be very likely to cause a serious derangement of their business, for some pollution cases in which he had been engaged had lasted many days, and even weeks. There seemed to be undue latitude in the definition of “streams”—for if any watercourse was to be deemed a stream within the meaning of the Act, it would go much further than could be intended, and in particular it would interfere with mining operations, which could not be carried on without using watercourses. Under any circumstances it was necessary that time should be allowed for the consideration of all these details throughout the country.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the criticism of the noble and learned Lord related to the merest points of detail. What was meant by “detain or render harmless” was, of course, that one or two alternatives must be adopted—namely, either polluting matter must be kept out of a stream, or it must be rendered harmless before it was put in. If the definition of “stream” included an "artificial watercourse," that could be remedied in Committee. His noble and learned Friend, also, had spoken of the 4th and 5th clauses, as "Saving clauses" as though they had created vested interests; but he, (the Lord Chancellor), contended that anyone could argue on vested interests by having polluted a stream for 12 years, and he denied that the Bill set up any such prescription. At present an offender enjoyed immunity, because individuals had either not the money or the direct personal interest to resort to litigation; but that was the only kind of immunity which the Bill recognized; but this Bill provided a cheap and speedy process of law and enabled persons interested to stop a nuisance at once. As the main object of the Bill was to invest an authority with power to restrain the pollution of rivers, we must in this as in other cases face the difficulty of selecting a tribunal. Doubtless there had been cases in which great expense had been incurred in raising questions which experts could do little more than quarrel about; but if the power conferred by the Bill was to be denied to subordinate Courts like the County Courts, and was to be given only to Judges of the Superior Courts, the practical effect would be that the Bill could not be put into operation on account of the difficulty and expense. There would be a large number of small cases which would be much better disposed of on the spot, on a view of the place by the County Court Judge, than they would be on affidavits supported by argument before a Superior Court in London. Their Lordships might very well consider whether in all cases the decision of the County Court Judge was to be final; but it would be premature to discuss that now. No doubt the Bill had been a short time before the public, but the discussion on the second reading in that House would call public attention to it.

LORD SELBORNE wished to say, in explanation, that he did not mean to affirm that any man could have a vested interest in the commission of a public nuisance. What he said was, that the Bill, as it stood, either created such vested interests, or that, if it did not do so and was not intended to do so, its terms were illusory.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that the noble Marquess had stated that there were various ways in which water might be purified, or pollution prevented. So, no doubt, there were. They had had long discussions in that House about patents of which there were 45,000 in this country. The moment the Act came in force the holders of some of these patents would step in, each claiming that he owned a patent for the only means by which pollution could be prevented, and in that way the work of purification would be a heavy tax on every manufacturer. Another result of its operation would be, that a manufacturer who could easily avoid pollution—say by possessing a site suitable for a subsidence pond—would get the Act enforced against a rival in trade who, for want of adjoining land, could not solve the difficulty so easily. No doubt, there would be many cases of this kind. It was 10 years since the first Commission on this subject was appointed, and the conclusion at which he had arrived, after reading much of the evidence, was that our rivers were hopelessly polluted, and that we never could make their water potable. The foul matters encumbering streams might be got rid of, but the notion of their supplying water fit to drink must be altogether put aside. Towns must be supplied with pure water for drinking purposes in some other way, and the sooner that was generally admitted the better it would be for their large towns.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday the 3^d of June next.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS (ENGLAND) BILL.—(No. 98.)

(The Lord President).

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^d."
—(The Lord President.)

The Queen's consent, and the consent of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales in right of his Duchy of Cornwall signified.

EARL FORTESCUE: My Lords, I have tried more than once to address you on this Bill, but would not persist to the inconvenience of your Lordships.

The Lord Chancellor

Now, however, before it leaves this House I must entreat your indulgence for a few minutes, and a very few minutes only. I have been for some time of opinion, and have publicly said so during the last 12 months at several Agricultural Chamber and Farmers' Club meetings, that some legislation on the subject was desirable; in order, while maintaining freedom of contract, to alter the legal presumption all over England to what it is in those parts, where an enlightened custom of the country has gradually obtained recognition in the Law Courts. I therefore think the Government was right in bringing forward a measure on the subject. But though this Bill has been much improved in its passage through this House, I still object altogether to its plan; I object to much of its wording; and I object to some of the grounds alleged by the noble Duke, its author, for its introduction. I object to the plan of the Bill because it begins by laying down a general principle in the most sweeping terms in one clause, while materially restricting its legal operation by subsequent clauses. I can conceive nothing more unwise or impolitic in the case of a question which has excited a great deal of popular feeling, and where a certain number of just and reasonable demands are mixed up with other unjust and unreasonable ones, than first to make an apparent surrender of almost everything with the one hand, while afterwards quietly taking back the greater part with the other hand. Such a plan of legislation here I think most undesirable, not to say dangerous, from the landlords' point of view. Now, from the tenants' point of view, I think that, after you have limited, as I believe rightly, the tenant's compensation for any improvement to a sum not exceeding at most what he has expended upon it, it is most unjust to the tenant that you should further limit his claim for compensation to the case where the improvement has been successful; however honestly the work may have been carried out in accordance with the notice and description given of it to the landlord, and however complete may have been the landlord's consent and approval. Indeed, I felt this injustice so strongly that I had intended moving an Amendment about it; and was only deterred by the hopelessness of carrying it, and by observing that the point had been noticed by others in the course of the discussion. Then in the interest of both landlords and tenants, I object to the general scheme of the Bill; so great a part of which is taken up with elaborate provisions about valuations and arbitrations, that its whole working seems to turn upon them. I therefore confidently anticipate that it will prove far less profitable to either land-occupiers or landowners than to surveyors and solicitors. Now with regard to these two highly respectable and useful professions, it should be remembered that their work is classed by political economists under the head of verificatory processes as distinguished from those of production or distribution: and that when the work of verification is artificially stimulated and increased by special legislation, an undue proportion of the wealth of the country will be unprofitably diverted into this channel; and either the cost of production thus needlessly enhanced, or its profits needlessly diminished. I object, therefore, to the expensive and complicated machinery of the Bill. I object further to some of its wording, and especially to the term "unexhausted" improvements as applied not merely to manures, which may not unreasonably be described as exhausted by one or at most a few crops; but also to buildings and bridges, to wells and watercourses, to roads and orchards; as if the buildings and bridges must fall down, the wells and watercourses choke up, the roads be stopped up, or the apple trees be blown down in the course of 20 years at most. The legal operation of this expression is indeed limited by other clauses; but the word itself is most unfortunate and misleading, and must tend to create grievous discontent with the measure. Lastly I object to one of the grounds prominently assigned by the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) for the introduction of the Bill—namely, increasing the production of food for the people. Time was, indeed, when that reason would have had just weight, in the days of the absurd sliding scale of the old Corn Laws, which we Liberals always denounced and the noble Duke so strenuously defended. For Protection did seriously restrict the supply of food to the people. But since its happy abolition immense quantities of food have been annually imported from abroad. And there is no argument of the noble Duke's about corn which does not apply more strongly to coal. Coal is even more essential to our manufacturing and commercial prosperity; for fuel means force. Coal is some 20 times as heavy in proportion to its value as corn, and therefore cannot near as easily be supplied from abroad. Coal is not reproduced, and therefore our coalfields are in slow course of exhaustion; unlike our cornfields, which under skilful cultivation can go on yielding corn for an indefinite period. Lastly, there is no extravagant waste or folly known in the production of corn, which has not been, and is not, ten times surpassed in the getting and using of coal. But the real fact is, that when a Tory Government determines under popular pressure to legislate in a popular sense, it is very apt, as we have seen before, to take a leap in the dark; to use clap-trap arguments and announce sweeping principles, quite unconscious of the inferences and consequences logically deducible from the premisses, which it has so rashly laid down.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3^a accordingly.

LORD PENZANCE moved to add at end of Clause 4 (Interpretation) the following definition of "letting value:"—

"The letting value means the value at which the holding could be or could have been let if the improvement had not been executed."

Motion agreed to; Words added.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he was anxious at this stage of the Bill to give the House an opportunity of re-considering this one question—namely, what was the most proper measure of the value of the compensation to be awarded under this Bill. They had been told that the improvement should add to "the letting value" was a condition vital to the Bill. He confessed he did not understand that way of putting the matter. He was perfectly ready to agree that the improvement for which compensation was to be claimed should be such as would add to the value of the holding. But it was a practical question how the value and the improvement for which compensation was to be given under the Bill could best be measured. He ventured to doubt whether the measure adopted by the Bill was the best from a practical point of view, and whether it was likely to be understood by persons hitherto employed in determining questions of this kind. He was not aware that those gentlemen had ever heard of the condition of "increased letting value." He had carefully looked into the provisions of the Bill brought into the other House by the late Mr. Pusey, and also into the evidence taken by the Committee over which Mr. Pusey presided, and he had not been able to discover the phrase "increased letting value." Many of the improvements to be executed under this Bill would not add to the letting value. It was the large improvements which would have an obvious and palpable effect on the rent of the farm, and which could be proved in a Court of Justice by the valuer or the tenant when he made the claim. But would that remark apply to the minor improvements under this Act—which would be far more numerous? It would be very difficult in those numerous cases of minor improvements, however valuable the improvements might be to the occupiers, for the tenant to give evidence to the satisfaction of a valuer or a Judge that they would necessarily add to the letting value of the farm at the moment as measured by the increased rent that would be obtained. He doubted further whether this condition was consistent with the other provisions of the Bill. In conclusion, he begged to move, in Clause 5, line 23, to leave out ("adding to the letting value thereof,") and insert ("the benefit of which is unexhausted at the time of his quitting his holding.")

VISCOUNT PORTMAN said, he had not interfered in the discussion of the Bill, because he had felt it did not apply, except in cases of the disability of the owner of land to give security to the occupier against the pressure of the successor to the estate; in fact, he had felt the force of "suave mari magno &c." principle; but now he yielded to the wish expressed to him to address the House. He had, in years long past, been in the habit, as a member of the Royal Agricultural Society, of visiting all parts of England, and holding intimate and friendly intercourse with farmers of all grades in all parts of the country, and he found that a real grievance existed, and was felt by them to need a remedy. He brought in a Bill in 1841 and again in 1843, which was supported by the present Lord Privy Seal, with some few other Peers yet alive, and was referred to a Select Committee, where it was amended and left for the country to consider. It was a Bill to give power to persons under disability to grant leases, and to make agreements for specified improvements on a fixed value, to be exhausted by yearly enjoyment, or to be paid for as the term of enjoyment was or was not completed. This House afterwards preferred to allow the subject to be considered in the House of Commons before taking any further step. Mr. Pusey, after conference with him (Viscount Portman), undertook the work, and although his Bill passed the House of Commons, it did not find acceptance in this House. Parts of it only were enacted in the Act called "the Emblement Act," wherein was a clause giving the tenant a remedy against the landlord, for the value of buildings he might have erected. The subject then dropped; because a system of loan was established which owners under disability were able to obtain a charge on their land to be payable by instalments by themselves and their heirs, really much better for all parties than expenditure of the money of the tenant; but in these more recent times an agitation of a larger kind had been created, and under its pressure it seemed that the Ministers of the Crown had decided to propose this Bill. In his (Viscount Portman's) opinion the great body of the occupiers of the land were indifferent to the subject, except so far as regarded the giving power to bind the successors of owners under disability. The chief agitators were the implement makers, the manure merchants, the lenders of money, and the borrowers of money. All those men wanted to get the security of the land for their money, and as soon as that was obtained, then to press on to abolish the law of distress for rent. There were, however, to be added some good farmers, who intended to quit their farms, who, in their last two years, by the aid of stimulants, could secure the utmost crop, and by the use of cake could improve the condition of the sheep and cattle to be sold off, and in addition to the gain from the artificial manure wished to get all they could persuade valuers to give them to add to their gain, rather than to secure themselves against loss, for if they were so to be paid the probable loss would fall on the incoming tenant. Again, some farmers of capital desired to spend their money to avoid the payment of interest on money borrowed by the landlord, whereby such men could obtain double interest on their money by saving payment and by reaping the increased profit on the outlay. Improvement of a farm was made by continuous and steadily-continued good farming for a series of years, not by any sudden process; and although in some parts of the country larger crops might be obtained than could be grown by bad farmers, yet to talk of double crops was absurd, unless it was where none were grown, and all that was obtained thereon was of course double. Too much stimulant did not augment the profit of grain crops, but often lessened it, for it caused a mass of weak straw to grow, which fell as the grain became heavy, and the crop was often not worth half what it would have been with "good" farming as contrasted with what was called "high" farming. The tenant ought to have some advantage in his future lease for his improvements of the farm. His view had always been that increase of rent depended on extraneous causes to which the landlord had a fair claim, on the improvements made and paid for by the landlord, and on the improvements made by the tenant which should be allowed to him in the new rent. He had always been of opinion that the relations of landlord and tenant should be governed by contract—either by agreement or lease or other written contract—and he had let all his estates on written contracts for various terms of years, so he might say he was quite impartial as to the clauses of the Bill. He thought the great advantage of this measure was, that it would induce the generality of landlords and tenants to make agreements and define their engagements strictly. The words which Mr. Pusey deemed the best adapted for the purpose they were now discussing were—"The actual value of the improvement remaining after the termination of the tenancy," by which words he meant what remained to be paid of the sums previously fixed by agreement, in all cases, a necessary preliminary. His noble Friend (Lord Oarlingford) proposed to use the word "benefit;" but he (Viscount Portman) preferred the present wording of the Bill. The Government had taken the right words, and had guarded them properly by the definition of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Penzance). In his opinion, if the present Amendment were agreed to, a great injury would be inflicted on the Bill and on the people of this country. Benefit implied an opinion formed by the valuer, while letting value meant rent which would be a fact established. To the three classes of improvement the words "letting value" were not equally applicable. To the first and second classes it was the best test; to the third class it was less applicable, because the so-called improvement was fugitive. It was, in fact, merely the use of stimulants to obtain a crop, and often was exhausted in one crop, or, in case of a dry season, was useless for any future crop. It was, in fact, the mode wherein a farmer was able to exhaust to the utmost the productive power of the soil, and yet it was capable of estimate in the increased letting value, by helping to maintain the land in a productive state, so that the rent was augmented by the continuous good farming of the occupier continued to the end of his term. He regarded this measure as one of very great value in one way. It would lead landlords to consider that Parliament thought it right that they should make their agreements in a particular direction, and it provided a remedy when the owner of the land was under disability to bind his successor. He trusted, however, that their Lordships would firmly adhere to this being a permissive and not a compulsory measure, and that they would take care to maintain the great principle of freedom of contract, which was the best for the landlords, the tenants, and the labourers who would derive benefit from their legislation.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY thought the most convenient way of estimating the value of an improvement was practically that which had been proposed by his noble Friend behind him. He wished to point out that while this clause professed to give to the tenant a capital sum, representing the unexhausted value of his improvement, as calculated by the increased letting value, that sum was, under Clause 7, subject to a proportionate deduction for each year of the tenancy, whatever might be the increased letting value. This was sure to excite a letting of injustice, as the two principles of valuation conflicted.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE preferred the words in the clause, which he thought were clearer than the proposed Amendment.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the noble Lord who moved the Amendment (Lord Carlingford) had failed to convince him that it ought to be accepted by their Lordships. The definition given by the Bill of an improvement was "an improvement which adds to the letting value." The Bill declared that compensation should be given for that which added to the letting value, and one of the clauses set out in detail the manner in which that compensation was to be determined. The noble Lord said that valuers generally throughout the country would be employed—and he had no doubt they would be—on such occasions, but that they would not be competent to deal with the letting value of a farm. He could not conceive any body of men who would be more competent than men whose whole lives were passed in valuing property.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he would not press his Amendment.

On Question that the Bill do pass,

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, as we have now arrived at the conclusion of our labours on this Bill, I trust the House will allow me to say a very few words on its general effect before it passes to the other House of Parliament. I am not sure that I recollect in my experience any similar case of a measure so important, so novel in principle, affecting such important interests, and having such extensive alterations made in it, and which, notwithstanding, has passed through all its stages without giving rise to a single division. I am sure that Her Majesty's Government will admit that we on this side of the House, while we have discussed it fairly, have shown no inclination to damage the Bill—and, on the other hand, we on this side quite admit that in conducting this Bill through the House my noble Friend opposite has shown that he was quite willing to receive suggestions from this side of the House made to improve its provisions. As the Bill now stands, though we may entertain different opinions—and I entertain my own upon it—it will leave this House with the general assent and consent of your Lordships. I think, my Lords, this measure will have considerable effect upon the relations between landlord and tenants in England, and I will explain in a very few words what I think the effect will be. What is the state of things now, and what is it that it is supposed to require redress? I do not know that I can better illustrate the case than by telling the House a story that was told to me not many years ago by a very distinguished Member of your Lordships' House. I need not mention his name. My noble Friend told me that he had in a distant county in England an outlying estate, held by a very substantial tenant. It happened that he had never seen his property for some 12 or 15 years. On one occasion, however, he was hunting in the county, and visited a friend in the neighbourhood of this farm. Riding over to see it, he came to the place at which he imagined it to be. He looked round about him, and saw a large and substantial farmhouse, which he had never seen before, and a very handsome windmill. He came to the conclusion that he must have gone to the wrong place, and that neither the farm-house nor the windmill could be upon his property. He therefore asked a labourer whom he saw where such and such a farm was; whereupon the labourer said—"There it is, straight before you." My noble Friend found that his tenant had actually, without his knowledge or sanction, laid out a very large sum of money, not only upon the farm, but upon the farm-buildings. On asking whether there was any custom under which a tenant might have done so, he was told certainly not, but he was simply holding the land at will under the ordinary law of England, at six months' notice. The story made a great impression upon my mind. No Scotchman certainly would have done such a thing without having some security for it—my noble Friend opposite knows that very well. It is a splendid illustration of the confidence between landlord and tenant in England and of the moral atmosphere which could bring about such a state of things. At the same time, if I am asked whether it is a satisfactory state of matters, I say, as the French officers said of the Balaclava charge—"It is magnificent, but is it not war;" so I say of this—it is magnificent, but it is not business—it is an illustration of a state of things which calls for legislation such as the present, and I cannot help coming to the conclusion that in future there will be under this Bill clear written agreements for the letting and holding of land, and will induce landlords to insert in their leases some provisions giving compensation to tenants who might be obliged to leave their farms or who had expended their capital on the improvement of their holdings without opportunity of recovering that capital by any adequate length of possession. I cannot doubt that a feeling exists among many landlords in England which will still lead to discourage the letting of land on leases. As an instance of this feeling, I may mention that not many years ago a noble Lord a Member of this House possessed an estate in Scotland contiguous to my own and had lived upon it for a great number of years. One day I happened to meet him in this House, and he said to me, "I am about to sell my Scotch estate." "What for?" I asked him. "You seemed to be very fond of it, and to enjoy it very much." "Oh," he said, "I have been persuaded by an agent to adopt that abominable system of a 19 years' lease, and since then I have ceased to feel any interest in the estate, and intend to sell it." That was a speech that let a good deal of light on my mind as to the feeling which might exist in England between landlord and tenant. The objection on the part of some landlords to granting leases shows a state of things calculated to lead to the stagnation of agricultural industry. In the present day, if farming is to be successful and under the new conditions, landlords must learn to give up somewhat of the ancient feudal power which they formerly held over their property, and the tenants must have security for money expended under the new and costly system of farming which has come to be the custom in modern times. We must give them security for their tenures or assure to them a fixed term of years; if we do not give them leases we must give them some other security, that if they let on from year to year and laying out money on the improvement of the land they shall not be turned out of their farms without compensation. With regard to the proposal that has been made to render the measure compulsory, I can only say that if it had been adopted every English landlord would have been compelled at once to re-value his farms, for the reason that tenants cannot be compensated in two different forms—they cannot have the advantage of low rentals, as is the case with a permissive system, and, at the same time, receive compensation for improvements either at the termination of their leases or after a certain lapse of time. Although I think that, as a general rule, low rentals are connected with bad and lazy farming, I cannot avoid the conclusion that a general re-valuation will have most mischievous effects. This measure cannot be made compulsory without involving a State valuation of rentals, for, without such a valuation, landlords will recoup themselves for the compensation they may be called upon to pay by an addition of £1 or £2 an acre to the rent of the land; and in that way tenants will be deprived of all the advantage the Bill is intended to confer upon them. We cannot, under a system of open competition, secure advantages to tenants unless we proceed the whole length of a State valuation; and are we to have regulation and over-regulation prices for farms? Such a state of things will not stand. So long as the Bill is permissive, it may have the effect of introducing voluntary agreements all over England; but any attempt to make it compulsory will be attended with infinite mischief. It is to the honour of the House that all parties have concurred in passing a Bill which is not an empty sham—which we have not passed because we think it will have no effect at all—but a Bill which we believe to be based on sound principles, and which will place landlords under strong and powerful motives to adopt agreements consistent with those principles. The Bill will have three great results—it will confer important powers on limited owners—which have long been enjoyed in Scotland under special Acts—it will make necessary written agreements all over the country, and it will allow compensation to go on as it does now in the form of low rents without necessitating—as a compulsory Bill would unquestionably do—a simultaneous and universal re-valuation of farms.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that the discussion on the Bill showed how everyone was disposed to look at the question from the standpoint of how it would affect himself, or how it would affect the interests of the community with which he was himself most intimately connected; and this was the case with the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), for the relations between landlord and tenant in Scotland were far more businesslike than they were in England. But then the diversities were so great that the customs of the South of England could scarcely be understood in Scotland. There the farms were principally carried on by men with large capital, while in England a man might have no more capital than he had borrowed. Till very lately not one among 30 or 40 tenants had a signed agreement. When he himself succeeded to his property, he did not find a single properly written agreement in existence between the tenants and his father—all they had to rely upon were memoranda of verbal promises and detached portions of letters. In the enthusiasm of youth, he wished to change all that and give leases; but he found his tenants would not accept leases. In the case of one tenant at £1,000 a-year of a farm which had been in the family for more than a century a lease was accepted; but when it lapsed nothing could induce the tenant to renew it; and he preferred a yearly tenure. Tenants insisted upon going on from year to year, and they would not have leases because they thought they were more independent without them. Now under this Bill landlords and tenants would be obliged, in their own interests, to have written agreements. If the Bill had been a compulsory measure nothing would have induced him to assist in carrying it. Nothing could be more disadvantageous to farmers than a compulsory law. It would be humiliating to them as suggesting that they could not take care of themselves, and humiliating to landlords as implying that they could not be trusted to make fair agreements with their tenants. Whatever changes might be made in the Bill in the other House, at all events he trusted no attempt would be made to tamper or trifle with the great principle of freedom of contract.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM thought he might infer from the speech of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) that discussion had changed his opinion of the Bill and had caused him to regard it with more approval than he did at first. For himself, believing it to be founded upon principles of justice between landlords and tenants, he saw no reason why it should not come into operation. The call for compensation for unexhausted improvements was not owing to any real want of confidence in the great bulk of the landed proprietors; but, no doubt, among the smaller landowners injustice had been committed in various cases, and tenants had often grievances to complain of, that in parting with the land they had received no compensation for improvements they had made. He hoped the effect of this measure would not be the introduction of leases as in Scotland, for in this country tenants had full security for their holdings—he had tenants on his own property who had held the same farm, father and sons, for generations. But this measure would be useful to the agricultural interest by laying down the principle on which compensation should be afforded; and if it was sound in principle, he saw no reason why it should not be generally adopted. He could not allow the Bill to pass without expressing his acknowledgments to the Government for having brought forward such a measure, believing that it would be of great use to the agricultural interest.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND, in reply, said, he wished to say one word in consequence of what had been said by a noble Lord (Viscount Portman) with regard to that part of the Bill which related to freedom of contract. He stated most emphatically that the Government adhered to that principle enunciated throughout the discussion on the Bill—namely, that it was not their intention to interfere with freedom of contract, and that any interference with freedom of contract they should consider as tantamount to the defeat of the measure altogether. The Government fully appreciated the conduct of noble Lords on the other side; they were grateful to them for the very considerate attention they had given to the measure and for the many valuable suggestions they had made; and he must add that the opposition to the Bill had been conducted in a manner that was most gratifying and satisfactory to Her Majesty's Government.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND)

BILL—(No. 100.)
(The Lord President.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he need scarcely inform their Lordships that he felt very much the great importance of this measure which he had now the honour of asking them to read a second time, and the responsibility which attached to the Government for dealing with the question. But it would no doubt be in the recollection of their Lordships that in Her Majesty's most gracious Speech delivered from the Throne, these words would be found—Her Majesty stated that—

He was sure he would not be contradicted when he said that no Government, whether formed of noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen sitting on one side or the other of their Lordships' House and the House of Commons, could with any degree of satisfaction feel themselves compelled to propose measures which were of a stringent and coercive character directed against any portion of Her Majesty's dominions; and when these measures had once been passed it was the duty, as it must be the wish, of every Government that they should no longer be kept in a more stringent form than was absolutely necessary for the safety of the country for which they were enacted. Therefore, Her Majesty's Government had thought it right and proper, as it had been their agreeable task, to look into those various statutes now in force, and see whether the state of Ireland and the condition of the country were such as to render it wise and proper to modify those measures and to do away with certain portions of them which were of the most stringent character. And they believed they were able to do this as to many such provisions. This Bill dealt with three separate Acts of Parliament—first, with the Peace Preservation Act of 1870; secondly, it dealt with the Act passed against Unlawful Oaths and Illegal Societies; and, thirdly, with another Act passed for the protection of Life and Property in certain portions of Ireland, called the Westmeath Act. The Peace Preservation Act of 1870 amended an Act that was passed in 1856. The Act of 1856, introduced in that year, was a considerably milder form of legislation than prevailed in the year 1848; but in 1870, the noble Lord opposite (Lord Carlingford), in consequence of the disturbed state of Ireland at that time, thought it necessary to amend the law, and the Act of 1870 was the consequence. By the provisions of that Act persons, although duly licensed to carry arms, were not authorized thereby to carry or have revolvers in any proclaimed district unless with a special permission. The Act extended the Whiteboy Acts to proclaimed districts. That portion of the Act it was now proposed to repeal. It also gave the Lord Lieutenant power to grant general search warrants in proclaimed districts authorizing the person holding the warrant to enter into any house or place to execute the warrant, at any time—by night as well as by day; and such warrants were in force for three months. It was proposed to abrogate this power by the present Bill. The Act also dealt with the sale of gunpowder: it gave arbitrary power to summon persons who were supposed able to give material evidence. The second part of the Act of 1870 gave power to the Lord Lieutenant to issue special Proclamations—a power which was now proposed to be given up by the present Bill. There were also what were commonly called the Curfew Clauses, which gave power to arrest at night under suspicious circumstances persons found in proclaimed districts who could not give a satisfactory account of themselves. That was now proposed to be repealed. There were also stringent and coercive powers given to the Lord Lieutenant to deal with the Press in Ireland, and to seize and deal with newspapers in a manner hitherto unknown in that country. The state of Ireland at that time might well be judged by the very coercive nature of that Act, which the noble Lord opposite felt himself bound to introduce and recommend to the consideration of Parliament. He believed, he might say, it was passed with the general assent of Parliament—their Lordships did not think that the powers then asked were greater than the necessity of the case required. This Act was to expire in 1871. It had been renewed by other Acts for the protection of Life and Property in certain parts of Ireland for two years, and in 1873 it was further renewed till the 1st of June, 1875. He had now sketched very briefly and hurriedly the various Acts of a stringent nature which existed in Ireland, and he thought no Government would be justified in retaining them one hour longer than they were believed to be necessary for the protection of life and property in that country. The present Bill was a modification of the Act of 1870. In the first place, it enlarged the power of the licensing authority. It enabled that authority to extend the licence to carry arms, and made it obligatory to grant a licence to persons having an agricultural holding on the production of a certificate signed by two magistrates in the Petty Sessions district of the person producing the certificate. The Act also diminished the punishment for carrying or having arms contrary to the law from two years, with hard labour, to one year, without hard labour. It also provided that warrants of search for, and seizure of, arms should be executed only between sunrise and sunset, and it reduced the time during which the warrants were to run from three months to 21 days. These were concessions made by the Government in the other House to the feelings of Gentlemen who were deeply interested in Ireland. Then the Bill allowed a summary trial by the magistrates in Petty Sessions, with power of appeal if the punishment allotted was more than one month's imprisonment. It also modified the form in which compensation should be granted, making it necessary that the Grand Jury should be of opinion that material evidence was withheld; and it gave the Judge large powers of review. These powers the Government proposed should be continued for five years. Then there was the 2nd and 3rd of the Queen—the Unlawful Oaths Act—modified by the 11th and 12th, relating to the administering and taking Unlawful Oaths, and to unlawful combinations and confederacies which had signs and passwords as a means of recognition, and also to societies for the distribution of arms. It was quite evident that such societies, unless checked, might be the cause of considerable disturbance and danger, arising from the distribution of arms and the dissemination of revolutionary principles. Under these Acts the persons joining those illegal bodies were guilty of felony. The 11th and 12th of the Queen provided for the searching, under warrant, of places where those societies held their meetings in order to obtain information. By the 2nd and 3rd of the Queen, societies of Freemasons and Friendly Brothers which had registered themselves were exempt from penalty; but during the progress of the bill through the other House of Parliament it was ascertained that some of those bodies in Ireland had not been registered, and the 4th clause of the bill granted them an indemnity. With those modifications the Government proposed that the provisions of the Acts to which he had referred should be continued for five years. The third Act with which they proposed to deal was the Preservation of Life and Property Act of 1871. That Bill originated in the inquiries of a Committee of the other House of Parliament into the state of Westmeath, and parts of Meath and the King's County. Such a state of things was shown to exist that the Government of the day thought it necessary to come to Parliament for the very stringent provisions which were part and parcel of the Act as it at present existed. By that Act powers were given to the Lord Lieutenant and the Privy Council to enforce its provisions by Proclamation in the districts to which it referred, a statement to that effect being laid on the Table if Parliament was sitting at that time, and, if not, within 14 days after it had met. Power was also given to arrest and detain without trial any person suspected of complicity with the Ribbon Society. These powers were so stringent that anyone at this side of the water would be very much surprised if any Government were to ask for them; but we must not forget that this exceptional legislation was intended to deal with societies which for many years had had the most baneful effect on the condition of Ireland. He would venture to read a few words on that subject from the Marquess of Hartington when Chief Secretary for Ireland. The noble Marquess said—

"The reports we receive show that such a state of terrorism prevails that the society has only to issue its edict to secure obedience; nor has it even to issue its edict, its laws are so well known, and an infringement of them is followed so regularly by murderous outrage, that few, indeed, can treat them with defiance. Riband law, and not the law of the land, appears to be that which is obeyed. It reaches to such an extent that no landlord dare exercise the most ordinary of rights pertaining to land; and no farmer, employer, or agent dare exercise his own judgment or discretion as to whom he shall or shall not employ; in fact, so far does the influence of the society extend, that a man scarcely dare enter into open competition in the fairs or markets with anyone known to belong to the society."—[3 Hansard, cciv. 994.]

That was a true statement of the facts of the case, and though the Acts were stringent, the results showed that they had been wisely conceived and carried out with moderation and discretion up to the present time. This Westmeath Act the Government proposed to deal with in a different manner from the other two Acts, and to limit its continuance to two years. It was to be hoped that by the end of that time it might not be necessary to prolong it in its present stringent form. It was to be borne in mind that the fact that the other two Acts were to be passed for five years did not by any means imply that they would be enforced all that time, because it would be the duty of any Government—and an agreeable duty it would be—if the necessity for them no longer existed, to propose to Parliament to repeal them. It would be satisfactory to noble Lords on both sides to see that the legislation contemplated by this Bill was entirely in the direction of relaxation, and he hoped this would be an earnest of what the state of Ireland would allow to be done for the future. He hoped it might be the pleasing task of whatever Government might be in power still further to relax the severity of measures which were of an exceptional character, and that the day might not be far distant when it might not be absolutely necessary to have a different law in one part of Her Majesty's dominions from that which prevailed in another. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d."—(The Lord President.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, this Bill was so important that he could not allow the second reading to pass without without compensation. With regard to the proposal that has been made to render the measure compulsory, I can only say that if it had been adopted every English landlord would have been compelled at once to re-value his farms, for the reason that tenants cannot be compensated in two different forms—they cannot have the advantage of low rentals, as is the case with a permissive system, and, at the same time, receive compensation for improvements either at the termination of their leases or after a certain lapse of time. The Duke of Argyll a simultaneous and universal re-valuation of farms.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, that the discussion on the Bill showed how everyone was disposed to look at the question from the standpoint of how it would affect himself, or how it would affect the interests of the community with which he was himself most intimately connected; and this was the case with the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), for the relations between landlord and tenant in Scotland were far more businesslike than they were in England. But then the diversities were so great that the customs of the South of England could scarcely be understood in Scotland. There the farms were principally carried on by men with large capital, while in England a man might have no more capital than he had borrowed. Till very lately not one among 30 or 40 tenants had a signed agreement. When he himself succeeded to his property, he did not find a single properly written agreement in existence between the tenants and his father—all they had to rely upon were memoranda of verbal promises and detached portions of letters. In the enthusiasm of youth, he wished to change all that and give leases; but he found his tenants would not accept leases. In the case of one tenant at £1,000 a-year of a farm which had been in the family for more than a century a lease was accepted; but when it lapsed nothing could induce the tenant to renew it; and he preferred a yearly tenure. Tenants insisted upon going on from year to year, and they would not have leases because they thought they were more independent without them. Now under this Bill landlords and tenants would be obliged, in their own interests, to have written agreements. If the Bill had been a compulsory measure nothing would have induced him to assist in carrying it. Nothing could be more disadvantageous to farmers than a compulsory law. It would be humiliating to them as suggesting that they could not take care of themselves, and humiliating to landlords as implying that they could not be trusted to make fair agreements with their tenants. Whatever changes might be made in the Bill in the other House, at all events he trusted no attempt would be made to tamper or trifle with the great principle of freedom of contract.

THE EARL OF FEVERSHAM thought he might infer from the speech of the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) that discussion had changed his opinion of the Bill and had caused him to regard it with more approval than he did at first. For himself, believing it to be founded upon principles of justice between landlords and tenants, he saw no reason why it should not come into operation. The call for compensation for unexhausted improvements was not owing to any real want of confidence in the great bulk of the landed proprietors; but, no doubt, among the smaller landowners injustice had been committed in various cases, and tenants had often grievances to complain of, that in parting with the land they had received no compensation for improvements they had made. He hoped the effect of this measure would not be the introduction of leases as in Scotland, for in this country tenants had full security for their holdings—he had tenants on his own property who had held the same farm, father and sons, for generations. But this measure would be useful to the agricultural interest by laying down the principle on which compensation should be afforded; and if it was sound in principle, he saw no reason why it should not be generally adopted. He could not allow the Bill to pass without expressing his acknowledgments to the Government for having brought forward such a measure, believing that it would be of great use to the agricultural interest.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND, in reply, said, he wished to say one word in consequence of what had been said by a noble Lord (Viscount Portman) with regard to that part of the Bill which related to freedom of contract. He stated most emphatically that the Government adhered to that principle enunciated throughout the discussion on the Bill—namely, that it was not their intention to interfere with freedom of contract, and that any interference with freedom of contract they should consider as tantamount to the defeat of the measure altogether. The Government fully appreciated the conduct of noble Lords on the other side; they were grateful to them for the very considerate attention they had given to the measure and for the many valuable suggestions they had made; and he must add that the opposition to the Bill had been conducted in a manner that was most gratifying and satisfactory to Her Majesty's Government.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

BILL—(No. 100.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he need scarcely inform their Lordships that he felt very much the great importance of this measure which he had now the honour of asking them to read a second time, and the responsibility which attached to the Government for dealing with the question. But it would no doubt be in the recollection of their Lordships that in Her Majesty's most gracious Speech delivered from the Throne, these words would be found—Her Majesty stated that—

"The various statutes of an exceptional or temporary nature now in force for the preservation of peace in Ireland will be brought to your notice with a view to determine whether some of them may not be dispensed with."

He was sure he would not be contradicted when he said that no Government, whether formed of noble Lords and right hon. Gentlemen sitting on one side or the other of their Lordships' House and the House of Commons, could with any degree of satisfaction feel themselves compelled to propose measures which were of a stringent and coercive character directed against any portion of Her Majesty's dominions; and when these measures had once been passed it was the duty, as it must be the wish, of every Government that they should no longer be kept in a more stringent form than was absolutely necessary for the safety of the country for which they were enacted. Therefore, Her Majesty's Government had thought it right and proper, as it had been their agreeable task, to look into those various statutes now in force, and see whether the state of Ireland and the condition of the country were such as to render it wise and proper to modify those measures and to do away with certain portions of them which were of the most stringent character. And they believed they were able to do this as to many such provisions. This Bill dealt with three separate Acts of

was quite evident that such societies, unless checked, might be the cause of considerable disturbance and danger, arising from the distribution of arms and the dissemination of revolutionary principles. Under these Acts the persons joining those illegal bodies were guilty of felony. The 11th and 12th of the Queen provided for the searching, under warrant, of places where those societies held their meetings in order to obtain information. By the 2nd and 3rd of the Queen, societies of Freemasons and Friendly Brothers which had registered themselves were exempt from penalty; but during the progress of the Bill through the other House of Parliament it was ascertained that some of those bodies in Ireland had not been registered, and the 4th clause of the Bill granted them an indemnity. With those modifications the Government proposed that the provisions of the Acts to which he had referred should be continued for five years. The third Act with which they proposed to deal was the Preservation of Life and Property Act of 1871. That Bill originated in the inquiries of a Committee of the other House of Parliament into the state of Westmeath, and parts of Meath and the King's County. Such a state of things was shown to exist that the Government of the day thought it necessary to come to Parliament for the very stringent provisions which were part and parcel of the Act as it at present existed. By that Act powers were given to the Lord Lieutenant and the Privy Council to enforce its provisions by Proclamation in the districts to which it referred, a statement to that effect being laid on the Table if Parliament was sitting at that time, and, if not, within 14 days after it had met. Power was also given to arrest and detain without trial any person suspected of complicity with the Ribbon Society. These powers were so stringent that anyone at this side of the water would be very much surprised if any Government were to ask for them; but we must not forget that this exceptional legislation was intended to deal with societies which for many years had had the most baneful effect on the condition of Ireland. He would venture to read a few words on that subject from the Marquess of Hartington when Chief Secretary for Ireland. The noble Marquess said—

"The reports we receive show that such a state of terrorism prevails that the society has only to issue its edict to secure obedience; nor has it even to issue its edict, its laws are so well known, and an infringement of them is followed so regularly by murderous outrage, that few, indeed, can treat them with defiance. Ribbon law, and not the law of the land, appears to be that which is obeyed. It reaches to such an extent that no landlord dare exercise the most ordinary of rights pertaining to land; and no farmer, employer, or agent dare exercise his own judgment or discretion as to whom he shall or shall not employ; in fact, so far does the influence of the society extend, that a man scarcely dare enter into open competition in the fairs or markets with anyone known to belong to the society."—[3 Hansard, cciv. 994.]

That was a true statement of the facts of the case, and though the Acts were stringent, the results showed that they had been wisely conceived and carried out with moderation and discretion up to the present time. This Westmeath Act the Government proposed to deal with in a different manner from the other two Acts, and to limit its continuance to two years. It was to be hoped that by the end of that time it might not be necessary to prolong it in its present stringent form. It was to be borne in mind that the fact that the other two Acts were to be passed for five years did not by any means imply that they would be enforced all that time, because it would be the duty of any Government—and an agreeable duty it would be—if the necessity for them no longer existed, to propose to Parliament to repeal them. It would be satisfactory to noble Lords on both sides to see that the legislation contemplated by this Bill was entirely in the direction of relaxation, and he hoped this would be an earnest of what the state of Ireland would allow to be done for the future. He hoped it might be the pleasing task of whatever Government might be in power still further to relax the severity of measures which were of an exceptional character, and that the day might not be far distant when it might not be absolutely necessary to have a different law in one part of Her Majesty's dominions from that which prevailed in another. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."—(The Lord President.)

LORD CARLINGFORD said, this Bill was so important that he could not allow the second reading to pass without taking the opportunity of offering a few general remarks upon it. His first feeling with regard to it was a hearty hope that it might be the last Coercion Bill they should ever see within those walls. His second feeling was that of satisfaction at the tone and substance of the statement their Lordships had just heard from the noble Duke. The noble Duke's statement was very fair to those who preceded him in office and whose painful duty it was to frame and carry the laws which the present Government were now partially repealing, and the statement was also fair and conciliatory to the people of Ireland. The Bill, in fact, amounted to a very large relaxation of the coercive code which had for some time been in force in that country. This fact, of which there could be no doubt, had been rather hidden by the course of events in "another place"—the almost endless Amendments moved by Irish Members during the progress of the Bill there, and the controversies to which those Amendments led, had concealed the fact that the measure very considerably relaxed the severity of the law. He did not grudge Her Majesty's Government any credit they might derive in Ireland from the fact that the Bill greatly relaxed the severity of the law; but he thought the people of Ireland ought to know that it was a fact, and that the Government and Parliament had been engaged all this time, not in framing a fresh law of coercion, but in largely relaxing the law which had been deemed necessary for some time past. With the very grave but still the limited exception of the Westmeath Act, the Peace Preservation Act, as it would stand in future, amounted to scarcely anything more than restrictions on the sale and possession of arms. If the Lord Lieutenant deemed it necessary, he might impose those restrictions widely; but, on the other hand, he might, if he deemed it safe and prudent, not apply the provisions of the law to any particular district. Of course, the Westmeath Act was a most exceptional measure, and one not to be justified except upon proof of absolute necessity. He hoped, however, it was known in Ireland that the late Government had had recourse to that Act with the greatest reluctance, and only upon proof of such necessity as made it the duty of any Government to endeavour to remedy the Administration introduced their Bill, the number of assassinations in Ireland amounted to 160; but, nevertheless, at that period of 1871-2 crime in Ireland was bad, dangerous, and increasing—being, moreover, of that kind which excited terror and paralyzed the energies of the country. The power which the Government now possessed of relaxing those severe laws had been brought about first of all by the success of the laws themselves, and next, he must add as his firm conviction, by the success of other laws of a very different character which were passed by the late Government at the same time. It would be uncandid in him if he did not say this, because when he performed the painful duty of introducing the Bill of 1870, he remembered saying most distinctly that it was his great consolation that Government at the same time intended to pass other measures, not of coercion, but of reform, to the effect of which, by moral means, it looked quite as much, and, in the long run far more, for the peace and tranquillity of Ireland. Still, it was, of course, impossible to wait for the effect of permanent measures, which no one but an enthusiast could expect to act by magic. The then Government recognized the necessity of exceptional legislation, and that necessity was strongly illustrated by the very remarkable concurrence with which those measures were received by Parliament, and in almost every part of the House of Commons itself. It was an important fact, often forgotten, that the amount of Irish opposition to those measures was quite trifling. Not as many as 15 Irish Members, he believed, voted against the second reading of the Peace Preservation Bill in 1870; and the case was much the same the next year with regard to the Westmeath Act. It was difficult to know exactly what effect would be produced by the long debates which had recently occurred in "another place." It was difficult for a bystander to judge. There seemed to have been a curious alternation of embraces and reproaches between the Treasury Bench and the Irish Members; but he believed it would be recognized in Ireland that both the Government and Parliament had brought to the consideration of this subject the utmost patience, and the utmost anxiety, to deal with Ireland as we would deal with this country, if we were legislating for any part of England or Scotland under similar circumstances. In conclusion, he must express his belief that the spirit of conciliation which characterized the noble Duke's speech to-night would not be without producing a good effect on Ireland.

LORD INCHQUIN said, he had no doubt the Bill was necessary—he regretted the necessity for its introduction as much as any Member of their Lordships' House; but he joined in the hope expressed by the noble Duke on moving the second reading that, long before the expiration of the five years, it might be possible to repeal this measure.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow; and Standing Orders Nos. 37. and 38. to be considered in order to their being dispensed with.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND then moved that the House should meet to-morrow, at 12 o'clock, for the purpose of considering the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

appointment was made by the Lord Chief Justice, which was notified to the Treasury on the 7th of May.

In reply to Mr. CHILDERS,

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, that as far as he was aware no condition had been made by the Treasury when the present holder of the office was appointed that, in the event of the office of Registrar being abolished, no compensation should be given.

In reply to Mr. CHILDERS,

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that the Treasury had no power to compel the person appointed to enter into the condition referred to.

POST OFFICE CLERKS—INCREMENT OF SALARIES.—QUESTION.

MR. R. SMYTH asked the Postmaster General, Whether the Clerks in the Post Office have a vested interest in the annual increments to their salaries, or whether these increments can be withheld from them for other reasons than personal misconduct?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Sir, the clerks in the Post Office have no vested interest in the annual increments to their salaries, which are granted for good conduct, and no increment is allowed to a clerk without a certificate that his conduct during the year has been in all respects satisfactory.

HIGHWAY EXPENDITURE.

QUESTION.

MR. PAGET asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether, seeing that the annual Return (Letter D) of the Local Government Board, presented in January last, gives the total expenditure by overseers on account of Highways up to Lady Day 1874, it would not be possible to expedite the publication of the annual Abstracts of Highway Expenditure under the Act 12 and 13 Vic. c. 35. the last Return of which only brings the accounts up to Lady Day 1872?

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH, in reply, said, he hoped to be able to expedite the publication of the abstracts referred to, and that he had given directions having that object in view.

METROPOLITAN BRIDGES.

QUESTION.

SIR JAMES HOGG asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in view of the fact that Committees of this House have reported that tolls on Metropolitan Bridges seriously impede traffic, and weigh with excessive severity on the poorest classes, and also in view of the fact that the present and late Governments have refused to sanction the plans of the Metropolitan Board of Works (brought forward in the Sessions of 1873 and 1875) for raising the necessary funds by means of the coal tax, which was the plan adopted by Parliament in the case of the Kew and other Thames bridges, the Government is prepared to give their approval to the enfranchisement of the bridges by borrowing on security of a county rate on the counties of Surrey and Middlesex, or to suggest any other course for attaining the object in view?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, he had fully considered the matter to which the Question of the hon. Member referred, and to the proposal that was made for raising a sum of money on the security of the coal and wine dues; and they had seen several deputations on the subject, all entertaining very different views respecting it. He had brought the matter before his Colleagues, and they felt that it was a course which they could not sanction. He was now asked whether he could say, on the part of the Government, that they would be prepared to give their approval to another course, or whether they could not themselves suggest some other. He did not see, however, that the difficulties they might meet with in considering another plan might be as great, and he therefore could not commit himself or the Government to any plan whatever; but any proposal brought before them should receive careful consideration.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1871—PICKETING.—QUESTION.

MR. PENNINGTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of The Queen v. Hibbert and others, tried before Baron Cleasby at the Old Bailey on May 5th and 6th instant for conspiracy against the provisions of on the opposite side of the House there were not more than five members out of the 36 who were present. Under the circumstances, if the Government had wished to make a House, they had the power to do so. I must also, in fairness, state that on the front Opposition Bench there was not a single Member, and if it had not been for the Members from Ireland, who were good enough to come down to make a House, the number of Members present would have been very restricted indeed. I have felt it my duty to state publicly these facts, that agricultural constituencies may judge of the amount of attention which questions affecting their interest command from the two leading Parties in this House; and I think it right also to state thus publicly the difficulties and obstructions placed in the way of independent Members when they desire to bring forward for the consideration of the House, Motions which may be considered inconvenient by the Leaders of the House.

Mr. WHALLEY said, that as the hon. Member for Forfarshire had brought forward a grievance, perhaps the House would permit him also to state his complaint. On Friday last the right hon. Gentleman appointed as the First Order of the Day a question in precedence to the usual Motion of Supply, and he did that by obtaining the consent of the hon. Baronet the Member for Chelsea (Sir Charles Dilke) alone, without consulting any of the other hon. Members who intended to avail themselves of the opportunity of bringing forward Motions upon going into Committee of Supply. That appeared to him to have been a most unusual and a somewhat unfair course of proceeding. He should be glad to have some assurance that the Government would in future, if Supply was left upon the Paper on a Friday night, not deprive hon. Members of the opportunity of speaking upon the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair.

Mr. NEWDEGATE: Sir, the difficulty in which the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) has found himself, affords but one illustration out of many of the hopeless position in which the unofficial Members of this House find themselves with respect to the Business they introduce. This difficulty has arisen with respect to Notices of Motion; but the confusion which the Order Book exhibits, among the Bills introduced by the unofficial Members of this House, appears simply inextricable; unless now, or after Whitsuntide, some system of reviewing the contents of the Order Book be adopted, and the House should decide which of the Bills introduced by unofficial Members of the House are worth retaining, as likely to become law. I desire, especially, to refer to the position of the Order for the Second Reading of the Monastic and Conventual Institutions Bill. [Ironical cheer.] Hon. Members must not, for one moment, suppose that I misunderstand the meaning of that cheer. It proceeds from those who desire to perpetuate that which I consider the undue multiplication and extension of these establishments, and to shield them from all inquiry. With this object, they have adopted that which I may describe as the policy of confusion, with respect to the Business of the House; their purpose being to prevent any matters connected with these establishments from being considered by the House. For this purpose, they have loaded the Order Book with Bills they never expect to pass, have written it full of Notices of Motion, entered for the mere purpose of obstruction, and have resorted to every stratagem and means of delay. This policy of confusion has been pursued with marvellous success during the last four or five Sessions; with such success that, although the Bill has been introduced in each of the past five Sessions, including the present, it has only once been possible to bring the Bill on for second reading. The question touched by this Bill is no small question, no insignificant matter; it involves a subject which has forced itself of late years on State after State, and Country after Country, in Europe, and has been dealt with successively by the Legislatures and Governments of those countries. The object of those who have adopted the policy of confusion is to prevent, to debar this House from considering anything connected with these Monastic and Conventual Institutions, and, as I have said, they have been marvellously successful in this process of incapacitating this House. Early this Session, I warned the House that for lack of due regulation in their Business, the unofficial Members—the great body of the Members of this House—were being incapacitated from the due performance

1. I would beg the House what is its principal function? being the tribunal before which grievances may be felt of the community may be in which remedies may be considered. Now, the of these Monastic and institutions, the circumstances in which they exist, and their history, is considered a grievance of thousands of persons, as their Petitions to their Representatives are not duly submitting their the consideration of the policy of confusion. The never hear me remonstrate, as I now do, of any subject at which the House rise, however adverse that it be to my views. But I oppose against permitting a of this policy of confusion, as us from the performance we have been sent into this state. When I brought the probable state of its affairs the close of the Session House, the right hon. General Lord of the Treasury instance, that the confusion in the Order Book in the produced by the unofficial, in his opinion, perfectly legitimate; that the Bills could only be considered, in short, so far as he, the unofficial Members, with, and strangle each as they chose; and that, instead of that occupation, the would be very happy to additional portion of the time in—short, the right hon. member to think that the Government a legitimate advantage which prevails in the the unofficial Members. The Second Reading of the Conventual Institutions was for Friday, the 21st; it was on that night the precedence to their own meals that they will avail themselves, and I give the right notice, that I will on ask him, Whether he will Whitsuntide, to appointing for the consideration of the second reading of the Monastic and Conventual Institutions Bill?

Mr. LOCKE deeply regretted the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) should have counted out the House on Tuesday night, inasmuch as he (Mr. Locke) had the Jersey Courts Bill on the Paper for that evening, and he believed his hon. and learned Friend was opposed to that Bill. He hoped, however, that it was not on that account that the House was counted.

Mr. HART DYKE: Sir, I had hoped that this Session might have passed away without my occupying the attention of the House even for one moment, but as the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) has rather pointedly alluded to me, I should like to say a few words. The hon. Member for Forfarshire seemed to lead the House to infer that it was possible for me to have asked the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Forsyth) to have delayed the proceeding which he adopted. Now, the facts are these. I am sorry to say that I was too late in entering the House to delay these proceedings, and was just coming in when I heard the bell ringing. With regard to the other remarks of the hon. Member, I will be perfectly frank with him and the House. I did not use any strenuous efforts on Tuesday night. I believe that it has not been considered the duty of the Secretary to the Treasury to keep a House on those nights which are devoted exclusively to the business of private Members. In the position which I occupy there is nothing more important than that I should consider the feelings and instincts of Members on both sides of the House with regard to these matters; and I am bound to say that on Tuesday a vast number of Members did express to me the most fervent hope that there would not be a House, and that a great proportion of these Members, curiously enough, represented constituencies exclusively North of the Tweed. Further than that, I have only one remark to make. I noticed that when the House was counted more than three-fourths of those present represented Irish constituencies. That struck me as a peculiar feature when the Motion was one affecting the conditions of tenancy and land laws of Scotland. I can only add that if I had the least idea that hon. Members from Ireland were so intensely anxious to keep a House on a question peculiarly affecting Scotland, and if they had expressed a wish to that effect to me, it would have been to me not only a pleasure, but a luxury to have met them.

COLONEL MURE said, after all the question before the House was a Scotch question, because the hon. Member (Mr. Barclay), who considered himself the spokesman of the farmers of Scotland, had given Notice that he would call attention to the melancholy relations at present existing between farmers and their landlords in Scotland. [Mr. BARCLAY: No.] Now, the real reason why the Scotch Members and other hon. Members did not come down to the House on that evening was because the Scotch Members especially were aware that there was nothing whatever in the relations between landlords and tenants of Scotland that called for the intervention of the hon. Member. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER said, it would be out of Order for the hon. and gallant Member to discuss the merits of the Motion of the hon. Member (Mr. Barclay).

COLONEL MURE said, he was simply about to remark in regard to the presence of 30 Irish Members to support the hon. Gentleman, that the relations between landlord and tenant in Scotland were very different from those existing in Ireland. He believed he should be supported in what he said by the majority of the Scotch Members, when he stated that the relations between landlord and tenant in Scotland at present were excellent.

MR. FORSYTH begged to express to the hon. Member for Forfarshire his regret if he had put him to inconvenience, and to assure him that he had received no hint from the Government to take the course which he adopted on Tuesday evening. His action was entirely spontaneous and unpremeditated. When he came down to the House there were only 12 Members present, and as there was a prospect of a dull and tedious Scotch debate, and as only four or five Scotch Members were present, he called attention to the fact that not more than 40 Members were in the House. The number was at once raised to 36 by an influx of Irish Members. He had been in the House for five hours in the earlier part of the day; and as to what the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) had said, he assured him that he was not afraid to meet him on the Jersey Courts Bill, but he did not wish to be kept waiting until half-past 12, up to which hour the Bill might possibly have come on. He also thought the Speaker was entitled to some relaxation.

CAPTAIN NOLAN vindicated the Irish Members for coming down on Tuesday night, because they thought an hon. Member who was supposed to represent the Scotch farmers ought to have an opportunity of stating the alleged grievances of that class. In his opinion, Morning Sittings were very disagreeable, and they did not at all advance Public Business.

MR. DISRAELI: I hope, Sir, there will be no further opposition to the Motion, which I feel sure will be pleasing to both sides of the House. I never favoured a "count-out," and I am quite sure that I have never contributed to one; but, at the same time, as a general observation, I must say that a "count-out" never takes place when the subject is one of general interest. I do not think the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. J. W. Barclay) has anything to complain of. He may have been unfortunate; but I do not think any combination of circumstances could bring about the result he deprecates, and which has given occasion to a very generous admission on the part of the Irish Members which ought to console him. The hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley), however, made a distinct charge against the Government—that by putting Ways and Means instead of Supply upon the Paper as the First Order, they prevented him and other Members from exercising a Privilege to which they were entitled. I can assure the hon. Member that he is quite under a mistake; for by the Orders of the House, it is open to the Government to place either Supply or Ways and Means upon the Paper. We placed Ways and Means in order that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Gladstone) should bring forward the subject of the financial propositions of the Government, and I believe we made that arrangement with the entire concurrence of the whole House.

MR. DILLWYN maintained, that when the Government invaded those days set apart for private Members, they were bound to do their utmost to keep a House for them at the Evening Sittings.

Clause 25 (Application of penalties).

On Motion of Mr. SOLATER-BOOTH the following Amendments were agreed to:—Page 8, line 28, after “constable,” insert “of the authority who shall have appointed an analyst, or agreed to the acting of an analyst within their district;” page 8, line 28, after “to” leave out “the prosecutor,” and insert “such officer, inspector, or constable.”

SIR HENRY JAMES said, he thought that the period within which a person charged with having committed an offence under the clause might be prosecuted should be extended from six months to 12 months after the warranty.

MR. SOLATER - BOOTH said, he would consider the point.

SIR ANDREW LUSK said, he thought that the penalties fixed by the clause were too severe, and would prevent magistrates from convicting under the Act.

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH intended to propose on the Report that the words “not exceeding,” which would give the magistrates the power of mitigating the penalties, should be inserted in the clause.

Clause, with Amendment, agreed to.

Clause 26 (Punishment for forging certificate or warranty; for wilful misapplication of warranty; for false warranty; for false label), agreed to.

Clause 27 (Proceedings by indictments and contracts not to be affected), agreed to.

Expenses of executing the Act.

Clause 28 (Expenses of executing Act).

CAPTAIN NOLAN moved an Amendment, the object of which was to throw the expenses of carrying the Bill into operation upon the poor rate in Ireland, which was paid by the owners and occupiers, in place of upon the grand jury cess, which was paid by the occupiers alone. Should the Government not assent to the Amendment he should feel bound to divide the Committee upon the point.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 30, to leave out from the words “by the grand jury cess,” to the end of the Clause, and insert the words “from the poor rates.”—(Captain Nolan.)

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH opposed the Motion, on the ground that it would introduce the anomaly of having the appointments and the payments confided to different authorities.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY supported the Amendment, and said that the policy adopted in the clause represented a retrograde principle, from which the Government were obliged to depart the other evening in the case of the Explosive Substances Bill.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH observed, that in the Explosive Substances Bill a new charge was imposed for a new purpose, but that was not the case in the present Bill. If the charge in the present case was to be paid out of the poor rate there would be a great anomaly, as the guardians had no control over the appointment of the analysts.

Question put, “That the words ‘by the grand jury cess’ stand part of the Clause.”

The Committee divided:—Ayes 105; Noes 38: Majority 67.

Clause amended, and agreed to.

Special Provision as to Tea.

Clause 29 (Tea to be examined by the customs on importation).

MR. YEAMAN moved in page 10, line 10, after “stores,” to insert—

“But may be delivered for exportation with the sanction of the said Commissioners, and on such terms and conditions as they shall see fit to direct.”

MR. SOLATER-BOOTH was unable to assent to the Amendment, which, if adopted, would prohibit the use of teas in this country, although the adulteration might be of a trifling character. He thought the Commissioners of Customs should have a discretion in this matter.

Amendment negatived.

LORD FRANCIS HERVEY moved in page 10, line 11, to leave out “unfit for human food,” and insert “of a nature injurious to health.”

MR. MUNTZ pointed out that “dried tea,” although not “of a nature injurious to health,” might be “unfit for human food.”

Amendment negatived.

SIR HENRY PEEK moved, in page 10, at end, to add—

"Provided, That from and after such division the canonry in the cathedral church of Rochester now annexed to the archdeaconry of Rochester and Saint Albans shall be permanently annexed to the archdeaconry of Rochester."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 10 to 12, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 13 (Trusts of Bishopric Endowment Fund.)

MR. SALT made the suggestion that it would be far more economical for the Commissioners under the Bill to invest their funds in Consols and similar securities than in landed estates the management of which was very costly.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, he thought there was great force in the suggestion, but deemed it necessary to give the Commissioners power to invest in lands, inasmuch as they might have occasion to buy a house and some ground.

MR. NEVILLE-GRENVILLE was of opinion that it would be easy to manage landed estates much more cheaply than it was done by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

Clause agreed to.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES LOANS BILL.

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

[BILL 123.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it consisted of a good many clauses, but was yet a simple measure, the main object of which was to alter the mode in which local authorities were now empowered to contract loans. Those authorities had powers given them by Acts of Parliament to contract loans for certain purposes. Some of those Acts were local Acts authorizing a particular borough or body to borrow money for specific purposes; others gave powers generally to all bodies under Bills like the Public Health Bill or the Artizans Dwellings Bill. The powers so given were subject to certain provisions. For example, the bodies thus borrowing were bound to go to the Treasury or the Local Government Board, or in certain cases to the Home Office, and show that they had authority to borrow; that they had not exhausted that authority; and that they had complied with all the statutory provisions in regard to the new loan they were proposing to contract. Then they were authorized by the proper Department to go into the market and contract the loan. Sometimes they obtained the money from the Public Works Loan Commissioners; but in the great majority of cases they obtained it in the open market. But they were obliged to borrow by rather a cumbrous process. There must be mortgage deeds, and considerable legal expenses had to be incurred; while the lenders of the money were, to a certain extent, bound to see not only to its application, but he believed also to the observance by the authorities of the provisions of the law as to the keeping up of a sinking fund, and other matters of that sort. Again, if any person who had lent money to those bodies wished to realize a part or the whole of his advance he could only do it by a transfer of the mortgage—an expensive and troublesome business. On the other hand, the authority that wished to contract additional loans must do so by the issue of new securities and by means of a new mortgage; and after all those new arrangements were not as public as it was desirable they should be. Complaint was justly made of the cumbrousness of their present system of Local Government. They found themselves embarrassed by the action of so many different Boards, each possessing powers which it exercised without reference to the others. Unnecessary delay and confusion arose, the various bodies were hampered, and the natural effect of all that was to raise the rate of interest against them. The provisions of the present Bill were simply these:—That for the future local authorities proposing to borrow should borrow by a system of debentures, to be issued for not less than £10 or more than £1,000 each; and that those debentures should be presented to the Local Government Board to be stamped. Before stamping them the Local Government Board would ascertain whether the local body had authority to raise the money and had complied with all the statutory provisions, and on finding that it was entitled to curities without entailing any charge or liability on the State beyond the supervision of the accounts of local bodies affected by the provisions of this Bill. He dissented from the views of the preceding speaker respecting encouragement of the application of sinking funds by local authorities. It was very desirable to fix a period for repayment or amortization of all such loans; and as the Bill provided for the employment of several modes of effecting this object, he hoped it would meet with support from both sides of the House. There was one point of importance to be considered, and that was, whether there should be any maximum rate of interest prescribed beyond which the sanction of the Government should not be given. That, however, was a point to be considered in Committee; and, meantime, he cordially supported the Motion for the second reading of the Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there would be no limitation of interest.

MR. WHITWELL said, that the sanction of the Government could not alter the nature of any legal contract into which local authorities might enter for advances on the security of rates. There was no doubt that it would enable them to obtain these advances on more reasonable terms. The question of audit, and its limitation, ought to receive careful consideration.

MR. CHILDERS said, he thought the Bill, so far as its general tenour went, was one which might be adopted by Parliament. He questioned, however, the advisability of extending these facilities for issuing bonds transferable by delivery down to local bodies of the standing of Poor Law Guardians. Again, he could not conceive anything more dangerous than that trustees under wills and settlements—considering the amount of property in their hands, and the extent of modern trusts, should be enabled, where not expressly forbidden, to invest in the debentures of any local Governing Body. He almost doubted the wisdom of some of the past relaxations of this character, but he thought the Court of Chancery would be horrified if they found that, under the plea of facilitating the issue of local loans, any trustees who might invest in the debentures of a particular Body, were to be at liberty to take the debentures of any local Governing Body. He trusted the Government would, before going into Committee, consider how that clause could be altered. Then, he understood his right hon. Friend to say that the Government would be empowered to appoint auditors for examining the accounts of local authorities, in so far as those accounts related to moneys borrowed under their special Acts and the present Act, but not in respect of their general financial powers. Now, the distinction here proposed to be made would, he believed, be found very inconvenient, if not altogether unworkable, in practice, and he hoped the Bill would be amended in that respect. In addition to that, he strongly urged that the auditing of those accounts should not be handed over to casual officials, but should be conducted under the authority and responsibility of the Audit Department, established under the Act of 1866. With the exception of the points he had referred to, he supported the Bill.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hubbard) seemed to think that this Bill was premature, because no Valuation Bill had been introduced by the present Government; but, if there was any ground for complaint, it was that such a measure had not been submitted to Parliament many years ago, because very serious burdens for executing public works had been imposed upon local bodies, whilst assistance in obtaining money had not in all cases been afforded to them, such as had been given in the case of the Sanitary Act and the Education Act. As to the indebtedness of the local authorities, no doubt it was large—amounting to about £84,000,000—but large as that sum was, it was not excessive, in view of the rateable value of property that had to be set against it. Great advantage had been obtained by the metropolis, from the cheaper means which had been afforded for borrowing money by the Metropolitan Board, and by the smaller bodies through them, and it was but fair that other parts of England should have a similar advantage. With regard to a Valuation Bill, that could be nothing more than a reforming and re-casting of the present system, under which the present assessment committees did the work. He did not think, therefore, that his right hon. Friend was open to the charge of putting the cart before the horse, while he thought that the local authorities had reason to complain that such a Bill as that now before the House had not been brought in years ago.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday, 27th May.

METROPOLIS GAS COMPANIES BILL.

[BILL 82.] SECOND READING.

(Sir James Hogg, Sir Andrew Lush, Mr. Goldney, Mr. John Holmes.)

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR JAMES HOGG, in moving, that the Bill be now read a second time, said, Sir, the question which I am about to deal with is a very serious one, and if the Bill should be read a second time I shall not object to the proposal to refer it to a Select Committee. The wide spreading feeling in the metropolis with regard to gas has reference mainly to purity, illuminating power, and price, and on these points great dissatisfaction is expressed throughout the metropolis. The Corporation of the City of London and Metropolitan Board appointed committees to consider what was best to be done; and in doing this they naturally had recourse to the Committees of the House of Commons, to see what had been recommended on previous occasions, and they came to the conclusion that it would be best to deal with the question in a wide and comprehensive spirit. They decided to present to Parliament three Bills, one Bill for the independent supply, another for the purchase of the rights of the Companies, and a third, the one which I now ask the House to read for a second time. As to an independent supply, it was stated in the Report of the Committee of 1867 that the absence of such a measure prevented a settlement of the question. I think if I read two or three extracts, I shall show that the Metropolitan Board only acted in a proper manner in bringing forward that Bill. I am now quoting from a Report of Lord Cardwell's Committee, page 15—

"In conclusion, therefore, your Committee have now to repeat the expression of our decided opinion, that either by the way of regulation or by the way of an independent supply, the consumer is entitled to a far more distinct control than he at present enjoys with respect to the supply of the metropolis, and if the Company decline to submit to arrangements, meaasures should be taken for a new supply in independent hands."

Further on, they say, in the last clause but three—

"The proper remedy would be for Parliament to concede to the City of London or the Metropolitan Board of Works or other local authority the power of supplying those districts in the manner in which the Corporation of Manchester supplies that city and its surrounding neighbourhood, and your Committee main cause of the want of the absence of any Bill and establishment of an independent hands of a local authority."

I think that in the face of such a strong characterisation of the City of Metropolitan Board were in a Bill such as I have regard to the Purchase think I need take up House in discussing the purchase of Gas Companies that the municipal authorities at Glasgow, Dundee, and those in England, at Manchester, Oldham, Nottingham, as have adopted it. I think may say that the principal authorities having the control has been entirely concerned. Furthermore, the Company brought in a Bill sent Session for the purpose of enabling their undertakings to be purchased by the Metropolitan Board and therefore I think they have also conceived the principle; and, furthermore, recently had brought before from the Imperial Gas Company upon what terms the Metropolitan Board would purchase their undertakings regard to the Chartered Gas I am bound to say that contained in their Bill a municipal authority would be of entertaining for one thing they were of an extravagant still, that was a matter of Committee would go if asked, and I have been thought it necessary to Bills, and that these Bills all go before a Select Committee of the House of Commons? I think were two of these Bills when they came to the second answer is clear and simple I am not in the habit of k less discussions; and it having been intimated to me that any discussion would have a fruitless character, and that I would have opposition which would have ensured the success of that opposition, I thought that the proper course would be to rely upon the Metropolis Gas Companies Bill, which is merely a regulation Bill, and which now I ask to read a second time. Before going into the details of the Bill, I may mention that prior to 1868, nine of the large Companies were regulated by the provisions of the Act of 1860; and excepting three of them—the Chartered, the Imperial, and the South Metropolitan, the legislation of 1860 now regulates their management. That Act of 1860 incorporated the Gas Works Act of 1847; and it is necessary for me to refer to that Act, because it distinctly recognized the interest of the consumer, for it expressly states that the surplus profits shall be applied to the reduction in the price of gas. As far back as 1847, the principle was announced that the consumer was interested in the reduction of the price of gas; and it was also recognized that consumers were interested as regards the profits of the undertaking. And this was also carried out by the City of London Gas Act of 1868 and other Acts which, in a distinct manner, show that this principle ought to be insisted upon. A clause in the Act of 1868 states this principle most distinctly—

“They shall fix such illuminating power and such price as shall be calculated—the Company to use due care in the management of its business to earn the full dividend.”

[Read on!] Do you wish me to go on? I only wish you to see that I can quote authority for what I say, and I will not take up one moment too much of the time of the House. Well, the Acts of 1847 and 1868 having shown that due care ought to be insisted upon, I do not think that the consumers, through the municipal authorities of the City, the Corporation of the City of London, and the Metropolitan Board of Works, are doing anything at all wrong in asking the House of Commons to reconsider this question. It is no novel principle at all, and all that we want to do is to make effectual enactments, the principles of which have already been recognized. Another point is with regard to the rate of dividend. The maximum is fixed as 10 per cent; and that is in the Act of 1847, Clause 30. The Act of 1868 also recognizes that, and says that it shall be only “after due care and management.” Having explained the principles, and what the Metropolitan Board and the City wish, I may mention that both these Bodies were impressed with the earnest belief that Parliament not only desired due care and proper management on the part of the Companies, but also to secure that object by giving the shareholders an interest in economical management; and looking at the various proceedings lately taken by the Board of Trade, they thought that the Companies had entirely failed, and although the City had advanced arguments on behalf of the public, it could obtain no redress. In the case of the Imperial Gas Company the Board of Trade Commissioners got the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, which was as follows:—

“We think under the Imperial Gas Act of 1869 the Commissioners are precluded from inquiring into the question as to the mode in which that Company have raised or expended their capital, and the capital for the purposes of this inquiry must be assumed to be duly raised.

In the face of that opinion it was quite impossible for the Board of Works to go further before the Commissioners. Though Parliament has prescribed the amount of dividend, and laid down that due care should be used, we were precluded from going into questions whether due care had been exercised or not, especially with regard to the raising of the capital. There was another point with regard to the powers of the Companies of raising fresh capital and also the price that capital brought. Under existing circumstances, there seems to us—the Metropolitan Board—a very great inducement to raise capital in an undue way. For instance, £100 shares can be sold very shortly after being issued for £160 or £170; and I need not say that this is a great inducement to raise money for the undertaking. Having alluded to this, I will touch upon one or two other points of the Bill. I have been asked several questions as to the repealing of the clauses in the Act of 1860. The reason for the repeal is that it is desired to secure a uniformity

That is the principle of the Bill. Another point is the question of referees, who will prescribe and certify the mode to be adopted for testing and recording the illuminating power and pressure of gas, and who will do a variety of other things. The proposition of the Bill is that one should be appointed by the Gas Companies; another should be appointed conjointly by the Corporation and the Metropolitan Board, and the third will be appointed by the Board of Trade.
We think that the establishing of these three referees will be the forming of a very excellent and very efficient body.
There are other provisions in the Bill of a secondary character, but they are simply for enabling the Act to be worked out and do not touch any vital principle.
I only hope that the House will agree that the Corporation of the City of London and the Metropolitan Board have endeavoured to approach this somewhat difficult task in an impartial spirit; and although they may touch somewhat the rights of the Gas Companies, it does seem to us that Parliament who has regulated them on many previous occasions may be very well called upon to regulate them again in an equitable manner.
In conclusion, all that I can say is this—that I put it to the House, and ask them whether they consider that unity of management, that unity of price, and the same illuminating power for gas is or is not desirable in this metropolis? If the House thinks it is desirable to have this unity of management, and illuminating power, and also price, they will read this Bill a second time and refer it to a Select Committee, where any details can be gone into and thoroughly thrashed out; and if they should unfortunately reject this Bill then the municipal bodies, whom I am glad to say upon this and other questions have been entirely in accord, will feel that they have done their duty to the consumers of gas in submitting a fair and comprehensive scheme for the judgment of Parliament to Act upon.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Sir James Hogg.)

MR. WHITWELL regretted that the second reading of this important measure should be taken in the absence of the hon. Member for Helston (Mr.
Young), who took a deep interest in the subject. He knew of no instance in which a bolder attempt was made to acquire the entire control of independent companies than was made in that Bill. He did not mean to say that it was not a right thing to do, or that it might not be for the benefit of the public; but he thought the House should be made fully aware that what was proposed was to give up the competitive interests of these companies, and place them under the entire control of three individuals. The Bill would be sure to meet with great opposition from the gas companies. As regarded keeping down the dividends to 10 per cent, it was quite evident that could be done without the public obtaining any advantage from it whatever.

MR. GOSCHEN said, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Helston would not be the only one who would feel surprised at finding that measures which they thought would have been postponed were nevertheless proceeded with. Certainly, they had not had adequate time to discuss a measure of this importance; but as the Bill was to be referred to a Select Committee, that was an inconvenience which might be there remedied.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, he was sorry the hon. Member for Helston was not in his place on that occasion, but it was the hon. Member's own fault. This measure was certainly an important one, affecting as it did the Gas Companies; but it was also important as affecting the interests of the public. He allowed that, as now drawn, it might seriously affect the interests of the Gas Companies; and if the Bill passed in its present shape it might be said that Parliament had not kept faith with them. But he believed it to be possible that the Bill might be so amended in Committee as to keep faith with the companies, and to materially benefit the consumers. This being a matter which might be dealt with in Committee, all he had to do was to see that the Bill was referred to a strong Committee with the other two Gas Bills now before Parliament. The right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster) had consented to take charge of the Committee. He hoped the House would allow the Bill to be read a second time, and then he would move that the three Bills should be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. ALDERMAN COTTON would impress upon the House that this Bill proposed to deal with property amounting in value to something like £36,000,000. He did not think that the profits of the Gas Companies should be unfairly interfered with, and thought that, so far as the municipal bodies were interested in the matter, they would rather regard the illuminating power than the price.

MR. YEAMAN observed, that the Bill would not only affect the Gas Companies, but the public to a very considerable extent. He thought it would have been much better if the Government themselves had introduced a Bill dealing with the Gas Companies. He could not help thinking the metropolis was far behind the great provincial towns, both in respect to the supply of gas and water. Edinburgh and Glasgow and other large towns had the water and gas supply entirely in their own hands, and the consequence was that those communities were not only well supplied, but supplied at the cost price. He hoped that the Government would support a proposal for transferring the works and business of the Gas Companies to the Metropolitan Board, so that there might be the best gas supplied at the cheapest possible rate. He should certainly support the measure before the House.

MR. DILLWYN said, he was rather surprised to hear the admission of the President of the Board of Trade, that if this Bill were passed in its present shape it would be a direct breach of faith with the Gas Companies. He did not think it would be his duty, after such a statement, to allow the Bill to be read a second time without a division.

MR. RAIKES said, he hoped his hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) would not divide the House upon that occasion; but that, if he designed to offer determined opposition to a particular clause, he would postpone it till the stage of Committee. He (Mr. Raikes) fully shared the doubt expressed by his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade with regard to some of the provisions of the Bill. Parliament could not be expected to sanction the 6th clause without considerable modification. At the same time, he thought the ground taken by the opponents of the Bill was scarcely tenable. He could not admit that the Gas Companies had a right to come to Parliament and say the Legislature could not interfere with their property so long as they did not pay more than 10 per cent to their shareholders. He thought such a position would be a much more serious contravention of public policy than anything urged by those who were in favour of this Bill. The position of the Gas Companies was two-fold, some being under the Act of 1860 and some under that of 1869. The companies that were under the Act of 1860 had a more elastic range, while as regarded the companies under the Act of 1869 the range was more limited as to the prices to be charged. It was desirable that, as far as possible, all the Gas Companies of the metropolis should be placed on the same footing. The subject would undergo a searching investigation in the Select Committee, and on that ground he hoped his hon. Friend would not divide the House.

COLONEL BERESFORD said, that this was the third of the measures introduced by the Metropolitan Board of Works during the present Session, and the two former had completely failed—a fact which sufficiently proved the utterly untrustworthy character of that body. In regard to the present Bill—on the 9th of April last all the Gas Companies on the south side of the Thames were before the President of the Board of Trade as a deputation, and assured him that they were quite prepared and quite willing to amalgamate if the President so desired, and with a view to economy, on the terms of his letter of November last, and to insert clauses in the Bill to give the Metropolitan Board of Works powers of purchase at a fair price, to be ascertained by arbitration in the usual way, in the event of any difference. Indeed, the Phoenix Company, by arrangement, brought in a Bill this Session seeking power to amalgamate with all the Companies on the south side of the Thames, and to carry out the views of the President as expressed in his letter to which he had referred. With the leave of the House he would read one passage from the letter of the President of the Board on the 11th of November last; and he must say, in passing, that though he had somewhat against the right hon. Gentleman on this occasion, it was a real pleasure to go to the Board of Trade on any business, for a more courteous and painstaking Minister did not sit on the Treasury Bench. The passage he selected was as follows:—

"It is said that two Companies, through whose districts the very large main of another Company passes, are about to apply for increased capital to create a new source of supply immediately above this very main. The needless expenditure of material and labour, and, above all, the waste of gas arising from these causes, must be very large, and if, by amalgamation and harmonious arrangements this waste could be prevented, there is every reason to believe that the annual expenditure of the Companies might be much less, and their incomes much larger than they now are. Under present circumstances it rests with the Companies themselves to propose such arrangement, and if they fail to make the attempt, they lay themselves open to the observation that, being secure of their 10 per cent, they have no interest in promoting economy."

Now, what happened? Why the Metropolitan Board of Works opposed the Bill, and threw it out on Standing Orders. He asked the House to receive that Bill, and to let it proceed and go to Committee, for the Phoenix Company were quite ready to carry out the views of the Board of Trade as expressed in the letter from which he had just quoted. The Imperial Company had a Bill for a similar object—namely, to amalgamate with the Companies on the north side of the Thames. The Chartered Company had already amalgamated with five Companies; so that if the House had allowed the Phoenix and the Imperial Bill for amalgamation to proceed, there would have been three Companies in the metropolis instead of 12. The Chartered and Imperial Companies on the north, with their new and gigantic works well away from the habitations of man, down in the marshes of Bow and Woolwich; and one on the south also away from dwellings on the Surrey Canal, where the South Metropolitan Gas Company had 30 acres of ground to cover. This would be fair and reasonable. It would not be abrogating the Parliamentary contract by the Act of 1860, or the subsequent legislation of 1868-9 1869. It would secure the public audit of all the Companies, and it would promote economy, while maintaining the illuminating power and purity of the gas. To show the unfortunate effect of this repeated harassing of the Companies, and of the attempted wild legislation by the Metropolitan Board of Works upon this subject, it was only necessary to mention that the Imperial and Chartered Companies, who, by the legislation of 1868 and 1869, had the price of gas reduced to 3s. 9d., with the illuminating power raised to 16 candles with the revision clause, were in 1874 charging 4s. 8d. and 5s. for their gas, spending £10,000 in the process; whilst the other Companies not interfered with were charging generally 4s. The Bill now before the House laid down a hard-and-fast line as to price, purity, and illuminating power; but it was impossible for Gas Companies supplying a sparse district to furnish gas upon the principles there enunciated. The Complaints, to which reference had been made, as to the price of gas arose entirely out of the circumstance that in 1873 the price of coal advanced from 14s. to 32s.—more than 100 per cent. It was impossible, in that case, for the Companies to pay a 10 per cent dividend, without increasing the price of gas; but the price had since been diminished as the price of coal had been reduced. He trusted the House would reject the Bill now before it, or that, if the Bill was referred to a Select Committee, the President of the Board of Trade would take care that the existing Acts were not over-ridden, and that the rights of gas shareholders were not injuriously affected, as they would be if the Bill now under consideration was passed in its present form.

MR. YOUNG said, he had given Notice of his intention to move the rejection of the Bill, which was in violation of a Parliamentary bargain made some years ago. After briefly sketching the history of gas legislation during the last 60 years, and dwelling particularly on what occurred in 1860, the hon. Member proceeded to remark that whereas the Phoenix Gas Company were only bound to supply 12-candle gas at 4s. 6d. per 1,000 feet, they would under this Bill have to supply 16-candle gas at 3s. 9d. per 1,000 feet. Could any one maintain, therefore, that the present Bill did not interfere unfairly with that company? If this principle were sanctioned, good-bye to any reliance on a bargain with Parliament for the future. Let hon. Members ask themselves upon what the title to their own property rested. Was there any that had a better foundation than Parliamentary sanction? Within the last few years we heard of the death of two men who never did a stroke of work for the pensions they received out of the taxes of this country, Lord Ellenborough and a descendant of Lord Thurlow, one of whom had £7,000 and the other £9,000 a-year. But nobody thought of interfering with their rights. And why? Because they were secured by an Act of Parliament. This was not the first Bill brought in this Session on the subject of gas. Three had been brought in by the Metropolitan Board of Works. The first was a Bill to purchase the Gas Companies at a price to be fixed by the Metropolitan Board. The companies would not submit, and the Bill was withdrawn. The second was a Bill to enable the Metropolitan Board to compete with the companies; another £13,000,000 was to be raised to do what was well done by the companies. That Bill was withdrawn for reasons best known to its promoters, and now came a third Bill in which the Metropolitan Board said—"If you won't sell, and if you won't allow us to compete, we will ruin you first and purchase you afterwards." He denied that there was any proof that the Metropolitan Board would supply gas to this great metropolis on better terms or more efficiently than the companies now did. He hoped the House would not admit the principle that where a Parliamentary bargain had been made and millions of money subscribed on the faith of it, it was possible that it could be revoked. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. DODDS seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Young.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. COLLINS said, that this was a very important question, as nearly 4,000,000 of people, the inhabitants of this metropolis, would be affected by the decision arrived at to-night. The principle of the Bill was sound—namely, that unity of management necessarily carried with it economy and efficiency. There was ample evidence to establish the fact that the local governing bodies of many large cities and towns in this country succeeded in supplying gas on moderate and satisfactory terms. No one could underrate the value to this great metropolitan community of the proper regulation and control of the supply of gas. Gaslight in London was of nearly the same importance to many as the light of day—the avocations of

—THE WAR DEPARTMENT—
BRITISH TROOPS IN INDIA.

RESOLUTION.

MR. JERVIS, in rising to move—the relations of the War Department India Office, as regards British Troops in India, are unsatisfactory and prejudicial to the public interest."

The Judge Advocate General, when asked a Question on this subject some time ago, said it was part of a much larger question, and could give no assurance that anything would be done.
In the year 1858, when the Department of the Secretary of State for India was first created, there had never been any doubt in the minds of soldiers of the Army as to what their position would be when they were ordered to proceed to India; but since then an extraordinary confusion had arisen, and he felt that unless something were done to bring the existing unsatisfactory state of affairs to an end it would lead to serious evils.
At the present time no man serving in the Army could tell, when he had a grievance, to whom he ought to refer it—whether to the Commander-in-Chief at home or to the Commander-in-Chief in India. Similarly, he could not tell who was responsible for the redress of grievances. With regard to the question of pay, and as to how far the British Army was to be drawn upon in order to obtain efficient and able soldiers sent to India at the proper age, he had observed that the India Office had done its utmost to put heavy pressure on the War Department in order to promote what it called economy, and the result had been a very inferior article. They wanted able and efficient men, of good education, and possessing intelligence, in the Army, and he could recall the time when in India it was most worth while to convey troops on elephants' backs, instead of sending them on the march, every man being as valuable. Originally, the Europeans in India numbered about 12,000. About the time of the Mutiny they consisted of 12,000. In 1859 an Act was passed enabling the Secretary of State for India to levy 30,000 Europeans to serve in India, independently of the rest of the Army. Thus they had the India Office and the War Office in the same country levying different forces —a system which it was soon found could not work—and it had to be done away with. It was felt that the British force which garrisoned India should be part and parcel of the British Army, and should take their turn of service in India with the rest of that Army. For several years past a correspondence had been going on between the Secretary of State for India and the Secretary for War on this subject, but nothing had been settled. When the present Ministry came in, the matter was in such a state of confusion that they referred the whole thing to the arbitration of a very able man—Mr. Bouverie, formerly Member for Kilmarnock. When the present Army Estimates were introduced, they were not informed whether those differences had been settled; and he should be glad to hear from the Secretary of State for War what was the basis on which recruits were to be sent out to India; whether they were to be efficient soldiers or only raw recruits; and whether the financial difficulties of the India Office and the War Department had been adjusted in a manner that would be satisfactory to the country. To enlist a man under certain promises was one thing, and to fulfil those promises appeared to be another. A serious complaint was made by the India Office on account of the increase of 2d. a-day to the pay of the soldier, granted some time ago.

The India Office said they had not been consulted on the matter, and that they could get their men for less money in the market. A little inquiry on their part might have shown them that they could not; but it showed that there was no proper co-operation between the two Departments. That increase of pay was brought forward by General Peel, and it was unanimously approved. In 1870, as a further inducement to men to enter the service, short service was established, and afterwards, in order to obtain their Reserve, power was given to the Secretary of State for War to allow a man after three years' efficient service to go into the Reserve. Now, service in India had been regarded as a pleasant service, because the men were used to greater comforts there than they had at home; and when a regiment was ordered home, the Government, for its own advantage and to save expense, held out inducements to the men to remain in India, and many availed themselves of those inducements. On the other hand, many men did not wish to remain out there, and the opportunity of going into the Reserve acted as an incentive to the men to behave well and get home. That question was raised, among others, before a Committee in which the hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) took an active part; and a suggestion appeared to have been thrown out whether it would not be well that faith should be broken with the soldier out in India. That suggestion, as appeared from this evidence, was, that although a circular had been sent out giving the commanding officers of regiments power to say that a man who had served well for three years should have leave to retire into the Reserve at home, that arrangement should be interfered with. When those things occurred and became known, it was hardly surprising that it was not so easy to get recruits as they could wish. The Army ought to feel that it was dealt justly by, and that it could rely on those whom it trusted. He should like to know how it was that a Warrant affecting the Army at large could not be put in force in India. The Committee which sat last year had distinctly recommended that the various matters which had been brought under their consideration should be settled before the next Session of Parliament; but when he the other day had put a Question on the subject he was told that nothing could be done without the Correspondence. It had been said, he might add, on the part of the representatives of the India Office that they had been taken unawares, suddenly finding that a large burden was to be thrown on the revenues of India, and that they were quite unprepared for the responsibility. The Under Secretary of State for India last year informed the House that the allowances to officers under the system were upon a large scale, and that they derived from them considerable emolument. There was, however, he thought, some misunderstanding on that point, for they remonstrated with the Commander-in-Chief in India, who, he believed, had written strongly with regard to it more than once, and yet, would the House credit it, that up to the present day not a single answer had been sent to those letters, and that the officers had been left for three years without any notice having been taken of their complaints? Now, what he wanted to know was who was responsible for this. Was it the War Office, the India Office, the Commander-in-Chief in England, or the Commander-in-Chief in India? When the Secretaryship for War was constituted it was distinctly agreed that the holder of that office should have the entire responsibility of the British Army, wherever it was, and that the Commander-in-Chief was to be his military adviser. It appeared, however, that the India Office acted in a perfectly independent manner. It was a great reproach to the country that it had taken 16 years for a man to endeavour to redress the grievances so much complained of. He looked forward now in hope that explanations would be given showing that there was a concord between the two Departments which might restore the past concord to the whole service. Looking at our own position and the condition of affairs in the East he trusted that we might have a cheerful Army upon which we might rely on all occasions. The hon. and gallant Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the relations of the War Department with the India Office, as regards British Troops serving in India, are unsatisfactory and prejudicial to the public interest,"—(Colonel Jervis),

—instead thereof.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY explained that if he had not answered the Question put to him in the earlier part of the Session it was simply because his hon. and gallant Friend on that occasion did not conclude with a Motion. There was a Motion before the House on which he desired to speak, and had he replied to his hon. and gallant Friend he would have been precluded from speaking for the remainder of the evening. [Colonel Jervis stated that he had made no charge of negligence against the right hon. Gentleman.] With respect to the relaaffairs in regard to gas is not satisfactory. This Bill is trying to put them in a more satisfactory position than they occupy at present. During the whole of the discussion the only serious objection taken is with regard to that 6th clause. All that I can say is, that the promoters will, if the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his Motion and let the Bill go to a second reading, let that clause go to the Select Committee of the House of Commons, and will let the Committee say whether it is suitable or not. I am quite prepared to say let that be done; and if the Committee of the House of Commons consider that we place too low a price, we are prepared to give the greatest consideration to the Committee selected by the House of Commons. I do not think I could say more; and I hope the hon. Gentleman will withdraw his Motion.

COLONEL BARTELOT said, the principle of the Bill was contained in the 6th clause, and he must vote against the Bill, so long as that clause remained in it. If it were omitted, then the Bill could be referred to a Select Committee.

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [12th May], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Vance.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, that as many of the Irish Members had left the House, he begged to move that the debate be now adjourned.

Sir James Hogg

Motion made, and Question proposed. "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Captain Nolan.)

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he did not see why the debate should be again adjourned. The Bill was brought forward for the first time yesterday by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) in a short and moderate speech, and to all appearance there was a great desire, on the part of hon. Members from Ireland who sat opposite, for a division on the Main Question. He had himself risen at 25 minutes to 6 o'clock, and had endeavoured, as far as he could in five minutes, to state his reasons for opposing the measure; but it had been talked out by one of the hon. and learned Gentleman's own supporters. And now the House was asked to assent to an adjournment, because many of those who advocated the Bill were absent. That he did not regard as a fair mode of dealing with the question.

MR. BUTT thought, on the contrary the interest of Ireland in the matter would not be fairly dealt with if the Motion for Adjournment were not acceded to. Over 1,000 voters—he had heard the number put at 2,000—had been disfranchised in the City of Dublin alone, because the same facilities were not given for placing men on the register as those which existed in England.

VISCOUNT CRICHTON believed the Bill was a most insidious measure, being a new Reform Bill in disguise. In the borough which he represented (Enniskillen) there was no grievance felt from the existing state of the law. He hoped the House would not consent to an adjournment of the Bill, but would throw it out by a large majority.

MR. SULLIVAN remarked that it was all very well for the noble Lord opposite to say what he did, when perhaps he owed his seat to the fact that a large number of people who ought to be his constituents were deprived of the franchise. What a terrible scare to that House, which sat under a Conservative Reform Bill, and to men like the noble Lord opposite to hear of another Reform Bill! This was essentially an instance of unequal law for Ireland. She would not be deceived by such proceedings as the present, but would declare in the presence of all Europe—he saw the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster

(Colonel Taylor) laughing. It was the only argument that he ever contributed to their debates; perhaps, because it was the kind he was best fitted to contribute. ["Oh!" and "Order!"] If he had said anything unworthy of the most friendly feeling—if his observation was more impolite than the hon. and gallant Member's laughter, he withdrew it. He urged that the clauses of the Bill were copied from the English list, and it was not asking too much to postpone the measure for a fortnight.

SIR PERCY WYNDHAM condemned the Bill. Ireland had hitherto been remarkably free from bribery and corruption at elections; but this Bill would put it into the hands of any one to agree to pay a man's rates in order to give him the franchise, which it would lower, while tending at the same time to corrupt practices.

MR. GOSCHEN differed from the hon. Member who had just spoken in his views with regard to the effect of this Bill. The hon. Member had said it would have the effect of lowering the franchise; but the franchise would surely remain at £4 in Ireland, whether this Bill passed or not. The question was whether those who were enfranchised by Act of Parliament were to be disenfranchised by overseers? He regarded this Bill simply as the application to Ireland of a system that had been applied to England. If it were an insidious attempt to lower the franchise the House would know how to deal with it.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 52; Noes 127: Majority 75.

Question again proposed.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK moved the adjournment of the House.

MR. LEITH seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."
—(Sir Henry Havelock.)

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he hoped the Government would not persevere in trying to force the hon. and learned Member for Limerick to proceed with this Bill. The course which the Government were taking in trying to force the hon. and learned Member to proceed was most unfair. It was an unprecedented course.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he would not have thought of asking the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. Butt) to proceed with the debate, had not the hon. and learned Member himself proposed to do so. [MR. BUTT: "No!"] The hon. and learned Member for Limerick proposed to go on with the debate, and then the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Captain Nolan) moved its adjournment.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had not treated the hon. and learned Member for Limerick and the people of Ireland well in the course he had taken in reference to this question. What the Irish Members asked was that a measure which had been adopted in England should be extended to their own country. To shovel such a demand as was made out of the House by a peremptory vote of this kind was both unjust and impolitic. He should therefore vote for the adjournment in order to secure a full discussion of the subject.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the hon. and learned Gentleman was not aware of the unprecedented circumstance which had occurred on the previous day, when his right hon. Friend (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) endeavoured to meet the wishes of hon. Gentlemen opposite by giving them an opportunity for going to a division on this Bill. It was important that good faith should be kept; yet no division was taken, and the hon. and learned Member for Limerick to-night moved the resumption of the debate.

MR. BUTT positively denied that he had done so.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY supposed that his eyes must have been deceived when he saw the hon. and learned Gentleman take off his hat. Instead of desiring to crush the discussion, the Government had merely been acceding to the wishes of Irish Members that this matter should be brought to an issue at once. If hon. Members used the Forms of the House to obstruct the progress of Business, they would do so at the risk of the reputation they enjoyed in the House and in the country, even though their tactics were approved by the hon. and learned Member for Oxford. In conclusion, he might state there certainly had been no attempt this Session to stifle any Irish question which had been brought forward.

MR. BUTT said, he had understood that if he had proposed to adjourn the debate till Thursday the Bill would have been opposed, and exactly the same course would have been taken as had been adopted on the present occasion. Believing that if he himself moved the adjournment, he should be deprived of the opportunity of speaking on the Bill, he asked his hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Nolan) to move the adjournment in his stead. The present debate had been forced on from the other side. He had no indirect object in view. The occupiers in Ireland could only gain the franchise by claiming to be rated, and paying the rates the same as in England before the recent alteration. It was not fair to press this Bill on in the absence of any Irish Members who had left, under the impression that it would not be taken that night. He believed that if the Prime Minister had been in his place the debate would have been adjourned an hour ago.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, the debate ought to be adjourned, and that it was unprecedented to pursue such a course as that proposed by the Government, especially in the absence of many hon. Members who had left for Ireland. He did not think from the number of Orders which preceded it on the Paper that any one could fairly have expected that the Bill would be reached that night.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there had evidently been, through fault or through accident, misunderstandings on the subject. If the Motion for the Adjournment of the House were withdrawn, he hoped the next Business on the Paper would be proceeded with.

COMMITTEE. THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee."—(The Lord President.)

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he was glad to know that the Government felt themselves able to relax the exceptional legislation which had been in operation in Ireland; but he should have been better pleased to hear more valid reasons for the relaxation than any he had heard advanced in support of that course. It was beyond dispute that there was less crime in Ireland at present than there was some time ago; but he believed that was attributable to the repressive measures which it was now proposed to relax. It had been said that what were called the "conciliatory measures" of the late Government had been attended with good results. Instead of that, he believed they tended to the encouragement of discontent by giving rise to the conviction that by violence, people in Ireland might obtain from the Imperial Parliament anything they might choose to demand. It was a fact of some significance that at the present time there were in the other House of Parliament a larger number of Members favourable to the disintegration of the British Parliament than had sat in any previous Parliament. Again, threatening letters were more prevalent in Ireland at the present time than at any former period—a fact which showed that but for the existence of the Acts dealt with in this Bill crime would be rampant. He objected to the clause in the Bill which gave power to the local Justices to sign applications for licences to carry arms. He feared that some of those magistrates, from a desire for popularity, and others from a feeling that there ought to be no Arms Act in existence, would sign for licences in cases in which the applicants were persons to whom licences ought not to be granted. Everyone would admit that measures such as the one before their Lordships were objectionable; but in the case of Ireland they were necessary, and as the Executive Government were sure never to go beyond what it ought to do in the exercise of extraordinary powers intrusted to it, he regretted that Her Majesty's Government had surrendered so much and gone so far in the direction of relaxation.

EARL SPENCER hoped their Lordships would allow him to make a few remarks on this occasion. He wished to do so because he had been a long time officially connected with Ireland while those extraordinary powers were being exercised, and as Lord Lieutenant he had the supervision of the manner in which they were applied. He did not rise to answer the speech of the noble Lord who had just spoken (Lord Oranmore), nor did he wish to discuss the policy of the remedial measures passed for Ireland by the late Government. He might, however, say that he had great confidence in those measures when they were before Parliament, and he confessed that his confidence in them had not since been shaken. He could not concur with those who expected an immediate effect from such measures. It required time for the Irish people to get over the traditions embedded in their mind as to the injustice of the Imperial Parliament; but he felt confident that in the end it would be found that those measures had not been thrown away, and that they were tending towards bringing about a cordial feeling between the people of the two countries. As to the Bill before the House, he thought there could be no doubt that no Government would ask for an exceptional measure of the kind unless it felt absolutely obliged to do so; and some passages of the documents read by the noble Duke (the Duke of Richmond) last night showed the necessity for the exceptional legislation asked for by the late Government in 1870 and 1871. A Government was bound to exhaust all the ordinary powers at its command before it was justified in coming to Parliament to ask for exceptional powers. The late Government was obliged to take the latter course in 1870 and 1871, and he thought he might now point to the success of the legislation which they asked Parliament for in those years. Instead of anarchy and outrage prevailing over large districts, there had been an almost immediate cessation of that state of things. He did not mean to say that there had not been agrarian murders in Ireland since that legislation—it would take time to put an end to such crimes; but, though there had been some murders since the time to which he was referring, Her Majesty's Government would bear him out when he said that almost immediately after the passing of the extraordinary legislation proposed by the late Government those outrages which had reduced the country to a state of anarchy almost ceased to be heard of. He might, without presumption, take some credit to the Irish Government for the way in which that legislation had been administered, because he thought that the Acts of Parliament had been put in force with success, and, at the same time, without curtailing the liberty of any loyal and peaceful subject of Her Majesty. The only persons with whom those laws interfered were miscreants who were the leaders or tools of those societies which had devoted themselves to the instigation of outrage and murder, and the characters of these persons were well known in the neighbourhoods where they resided. He felt great satisfaction at learning that Her Majesty's Government, who had the best means of knowing the state of the country, felt at liberty to relax the powers which the Acts of 1870 and 1871 conferred. He felt satisfied that the Government was well advised in the matter, and he could not agree with the noble Lord (Lord Oranmore), who seemed to think that the immediate result of that relaxation would be an immediate revival of the illegal combinations which had spread so much alarm through the country. He quite admitted that it would be impolitic to put an end to those extraordinary powers altogether, unless there was evidence that those against whom they were aimed had given up their old traditions. It was, unfortunately, true that in many districts the lower orders of the population had been imbued with, and brought up in the traditions of, Ribbonism. They acknowledged Ribbon Law, and scarcely admitted any other. Well, you would not get rid of such traditions all at once; and so long as the habits and customs to which they had given rise existed in certain districts, restrictive laws of greater or less severity must be continued for those districts. He shared in the antipathy to those measures which some hon. Members in "another place" were so fond of putting forward; but he could not agree with those hon. Gentlemen that those measures should be at once put an end to. Those hon. Members said—"How dishonest you are to ask for such measures, when at the same time you point to the increased wealth and general improvement of the country!" Now, though he did not agree with the noble Lord (Lord Oranmore), who seemed to be of opinion that the improvement in Ireland was to be entirely attributed to these laws, he did hold that they had had their effect in bringing about a beneficial change, and he believed that it was absolutely necessary to continue them in some districts in order that the people of those places should know that Parliament was determined to put down agrarian outrage and murder. He now came to the question of the Arms Acts. There were points in respect of them where he could have wished that some further relaxation had been proposed; but he had the greatest trust that the Government would handle the measure with justice, and still further relax its stringency if it saw its way to doing so. Though he differed from the Party who had now the conduct of affairs, he had full confidence that the present Irish Government would administer the law in a spirit of fairness and justice. As to the Arms Act, he wished to explain why it was that up to the time of his leaving Ireland the Government with which he was connected had not felt that it would be justified in relaxing that enactment. A great many of the counties in which it was in force were seaboard counties, and it unfortunately happened that either for the purpose of showing those from whom they received money that they were doing something, or for some other reason, the parties engaged in illegal organizations were in the habit of importing arms. Consequently, if the Government had relaxed

the Act in certain counties, they would have become centres for the collection and distribution of arms. He thought, however, that it might be possible to draw a legal distinction between the carrying of military arms and revolvers, and the carrying of other descriptions of arms. He hoped that although this point was not included in the present Bill, the Government might practically deal with it, and he therefore referred to this question in the hope that it would be taken into consideration. There was one alteration proposed in the Bill which he somewhat regretted. It was that which provided for the signing of the certificate to carry arms by two local Justices, on whose signatures the stipendiary magistrate was to act. He believed the stipendiary or resident magistrates had administered the law, with regard to granting certificates, in the most upright way possible. He certainly remembered a case which had been referred to in "another place," and which had given him a good deal of trouble. It was the case of a bank clerk at Portumna, in the county of Galway, to whom the resident magistrate refused a licence. When the case was brought under his notice as Lord Lieutenant, he communicated to that magistrate his opinion that he had not exercised a wise discretion in refusing the licence. But an isolated case could not throw discredit on the manner in which the resident magistrates had administered the Arms Act. Now, what would be the effect of the new clause requiring the resident magistrate to act on the certificate of two local magistrates? A resident magistrate had a large district. His district might, perhaps, embrace a large number of Petty Sessions divisions. In some of these, easy-going magistrates might sign certificates very freely — perhaps too freely; while in others, magistrates might be very severe and refuse certificates to respectable men, who without danger might be allowed to carry arms. A difference in practice as regarded signing certificates might arise from the law not being very well understood. A local magistrate might imagine that the Arms Act was intended to assist him in preserving game, and might refuse to sign a licence for a man who had frightened some game on his land. He hoped he was wrong; but he feared that cases would arise in which the proposed alteration would place the resident magistrates in great difficulty. He also feared that in the North of Ireland they would be placed in considerable difficulty at times when religious differences stirred up the rival factions, and when processions were being got up. He thought that another alteration proposed in the Bill—that having reference to the manner in which compensation was to be awarded—was very advisable. In that respect through inadequacy in its wording the Act of 1870 had committed injustice. By way of illustration he might refer to a murder of the grossest character. A lady was murdered in the suburbs of Dublin. There could be no doubt that the murder was of an agrarian character, and that it had been planned in the Queen's County, though it was carried out in the neighbourhood of Dublin. Although the Irish Government used every effort to bring the perpetrator or perpetrators to justice, it failed in doing so—it never was able to obtain evidence; application was made for heavy compensation, and the Grand Jury of Dublin felt bound to grant it. Now, he need scarcely observe to their Lordships that it never had been contemplated by the framers of the Act of Parliament that the payment of compensation should fall on a perfectly innocent neighbourhood, as it had fallen in that case; but there could be no doubt that the wording of the Act made the compensation payable by the district in which the outrage had been committed. He hoped the alteration of the wording proposed in the present Bill would prevent the recurrence of such an injustice as that which he had just brought under the notice of their Lordships. He was satisfied that there was an improvement in the tone of Ireland, and he did believe that the people of Ireland would learn to have that confidence in the administration of the law which was entertained in England and Scotland. When they had, it would no longer be necessary to propose such laws as this; and he was confident that nobody in this country would rejoice more heartily than they Lordships' House at the arrival of that day.

LORD INCHQUIN concurred with the noble Earl (Earl Spencer) that the resident magistrates had carried out the Arms Act with great discretion, and he thought the change proposed by the Government in the clause relating to the signing of the application by two local magistrates was of so doubtful a character that he would be glad to see an Amendment, even at the eleventh hour, which would give a veto on the action of the local Justices. In the county of Clare, after the perpetration of an attempt at murder, a man's thumb, which had been blown off by the bursting of a pistol or other firearm, was found near the place where the outrage had been committed. The man to whom the thumb was supposed to have belonged held a licence for a public-house. That man made application for another licence; and the resident magistrate applied to him to come from a distance to the Session at which the application was to be heard, because it was believed that the magistrates in the neighbourhood would be afraid to vote against the granting of the licence. He did not doubt the loyalty and justice of the magistrates of Ireland as a body; bearing in mind the manner in which they were too often appointed, he feared they would not always be able to resist the pressure which would be brought to bear upon them to give the necessary recommendation. In such a case the resident magistrate would have no option but to grant the licence. In some cases the men who filled the office of unpaid magistrates were not persons who should fill the office. He would prefer to see the Commission of the Peace given to some substantial farmers than to certain of those gentlemen. Requisitions for the appointment of particular gentlemen to the Commission were hawked about, and in some instances, he believed, by the candidates themselves. Such a requisition had been brought to himself for signature, with his name already written in pencil; it being taken for granted that those who were asked for their signatures would give them as a matter of course. He would much prefer that the law should be allowed to stand as it was; or, at any rate, that a veto should be reserved to the resident magistrate. He much doubted whether the clause with regard to compensation in cases where information was withheld would work satisfactorily even in its amended form. It was very difficult in some cases to say that available evidence had been withheld, merely because no evidence was forthcoming. The point was one which it was not always easy to decide.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not think that the difficulty apprehended by the noble Earl (Earl Spencer) and the noble Lord who had just addressed the House would arise from the clause relating to the signing by two local Justices of the application for a licence to carry arms, because not only must the application be signed by two Justices in the locality of the applicant, but the latter must be a person having an agricultural holding in the district of the two magistrates signing the recommendation. He thought that provision would be sufficient to prevent licences being granted to improper persons. He believed, also, that the change in the clause referring to compensation would prevent any injustice, because it would be for the Grand Jury to decide whether evidence had been withheld in the district in which the offence had been committed.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he did not quite agree with the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack on that part of the Bill which had reference to giving an appeal to the Judge of Assize in matters of compensation. He could not think that the interpretation of the noble and learned Lord was correct, either in reference to that question or upon the Arms clause.

ARMY—CLARK'S MODEL FOR DRILL INSTRUCTION—QUESTION.

MR. HAYTER asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has had under his consideration the Model for instruction in Drill, patented by Capt. E. P. Clark of the Hereford Militia, and approved by the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief and the Adjutant General, and if he approves of the same; whether he will direct any of the models to be issued for the instruction of officers and non-commissioned officers of the Army; and, whether he would be prepared to recommend the inventor for any reward?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY, in reply, said, that he had seen the invention in question, but did not himself pretend to express an opinion as to its merits. He had, however, referred the matter to the military authorities, who had also seen the invention, and, while they thought it was very ingenious, they were not of opinion that the War Department would be justified in incurring expenses either with regard to the issue of models for the instruction of officers and non-commissioned officers, or as to any reward to the inventor. In these circumstances, he was afraid the inventor must trust to his own ingenuity to recommend his model to the Army.

DIPLOMATIC RESERVE—THE GERMAN AMBASSADOR AND THE ROMAN CATHOLICS.—QUESTION.

MR. SULLIVAN to asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If his attention has been called to the reports in the London morning papers of the 13th inst., from which it would appear that on the 12th inst. the German Ambassador to this country attended at and participated in the proceedings of a political club in this city, and delivered on that occasion a speech, in which, after making reference to the severe laws now being passed and enforced in his own country in reference to the exercise of the Catholic religion, he is reported to have used these words—

"I hope that struggle will be spared to this country for some time; but I think you had better look out in time. I think you see in Ireland what is going on; I think you have not to look too far to see what is preparing, and what will be the case in this country;"

and, I wish further to ask, whether the attendance of a Foreign Ambassador at such a political club, and the delivery thereof of such a speech, is in accordance with diplomatic custom; and, if not, whether Her Majesty's Government intend to take notice of such a proceeding?

MR. DISRAELI: Mr. Speaker, I read in the newspapers an account of the circumstances to which the hon. Gentleman has referred; and it appeared to me, so far as I could judge, that the observations in question were private remarks made at a club dinner. The hon. Gentleman describes the club as a political club. I was not aware that it was a political club, or that it could be particularly distinguished by the epithet he has applied to it. I should rather call it a religious club. The hon. Gentleman wishes me to say whether—

"The attendance of a Foreign Ambassador at such a political club, and the delivery thereof of such a speech, is in accordance with diplomatic custom?"

I should say it is not in accordance with diplomatic custom; but, at the same time, it is a thing which I have no particular wish to discourage. I think it hardly becomes a Ministry—an English Ministry—to discourage free speech under any circumstances; and, with respect to these particular observations, I should say it is, perhaps, not impossible that his Excellency may pay a visit to Ireland personally in the course of the autumn, and there find that there is no analogy whatever between the circumstances of the Roman Catholic subjects of the Emperor of Germany and those of the Roman Catholic subjects of the Queen.

ate for India to levy 30,000 Europeans to serve in India, independently of the rest of the Army. Thus they had the India Office and the War Office in the same country levying different forces in a system which it was soon found could not work—and it had to be done away with.

It was felt that the British force garrisoned in India should be part of the British Army, and should take their turn of service in India with the rest of that Army. For many years past a correspondence had been going on between the Secretary of State for India and the Secretary of State for War on this subject, but nothing had been settled. When the present Ministry came in, the matter was in such a state of confusion that they referred the matter to the arbitration of a very experienced man—Mr. Bouverie, formerly Member for Kilmarnock. When the present

Estimates were introduced, they were not informed whether those difficulties had been settled; and he should like to hear from the Secretary of State for War what was the basis on which recruits were to be sent out to India; whether they were to be efficient soldiers or only raw recruits; and whether the financial difficulties of the India Office and the War Department had been settled in a manner that would be satisfactory to the country. To enlist a man under certain promises was one thing, and to fulfil those promises was another. A serious complaint was made by the India Office on account of the increase of 2d. a-day to the pay of the soldier, granted some time ago. The India Office said they had not been consulted on the matter, and that they could not get their men for less money in the present state of the market. A little inquiry on their part might have shown them that they could not do so, but it showed that there was no real co-operation between the two Departments. That increase of pay was brought forward by General Peel, and was discussed in that House, and it was unanimously approved. In 1870, as an inducement to men to enter the Army, short service was established. Afterwards, in order to obtain their full pay, power was given to the Secretary of State for War to allow a man to go on three years' efficient service to go into the Reserve. Now, service in India has been regarded as a pleasant service, so that the men were used to greater comforts there than they had at home; and when a regiment was ordered home, the Government, for its own advantage and to save expense, held out inducements to the men to remain in India, and many availed themselves of those inducements. On the other hand, many men did not wish to remain out there, and the opportunity of going into the Reserve acted as an incentive to the men to behave well and get home. That question was raised, among others, before a Committee in which the hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) took an active part; and a suggestion appeared to have been thrown out whether it would not be well that that faith should be broken with the soldier out in India. That suggestion, as appeared from this evidence, was, that although a circular had been sent out giving the commanding officers of regiments power to say that a man who had served well for three years should have leave to retire into the Reserve at home, that arrangement should be interfered with. When those things occurred and became known, it was hardly surprising that it was not so easy to get recruits as they could wish. The Army ought to feel that it was dealt justly by, and that it could rely on those whom it trusted. He should like to know how it was that a Warrant affecting the Army at large could not be put in force in India. The Committee which sat last year had distinctly recommended that the various matters which had been brought under their consideration should be settled before the next Session of Parliament; but when he the other day had put a Question on the subject he was told that nothing could be done without the Correspondence. It had been said, he might add, on the part of the representatives of the India Office that they had been taken unawares, suddenly finding that a large burden was to be thrown on the revenues of India, and that they were quite unprepared for the responsibility. The Under Secretary of State for India last year informed the House that the allowances to officers under the system were upon a large scale, and that they derived from them considerable emolument. There was, however, he thought, some misunderstanding on that point, for they remonstrated with the Commander-in-Chief in India, who, he believed, had written strongly with regard to it more than once, and yet, would the House credit it, that up to the present day not a single answer had been sent to those letters, and that the officers had been left for three years without any notice having been taken of their complaints? Now, what he wanted to know was who was responsible for this. Was it the War Office, the India Office, the Commander-in-Chief in England, or the Commander-in-Chief in India? When the Secretaryship for War was constituted it was distinctly agreed that the holder of that office should have the entire responsibility of the British Army, wherever it was, and that the Commander-in-Chief was to be his military adviser. It appeared, however, that the India Office acted in a perfectly independent manner. It was a great reproach to the country that it had taken 16 years for a man to endeavour to redress the grievances so much complained of. He looked forward now in hope that explanations would be given showing that there was a concord between the two Departments which might restore the past concord to the whole service. Looking at our own position and the condition of affairs in the East he trusted that we might have a cheerful Army upon which we might rely on all occasions. The hon. and gallant Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the relations of the War Department with the India Office, as regards British Troops serving in India, are unsatisfactory and prejudicial to the public interest,"—(Colonel Jervis),—instead thereof.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY explained that if he had not answered the Question put to him in the earlier part of the Session it was simply because his hon. and gallant Friend on that occasion did not conclude with a Motion. There was a Motion before the House on which he desired to speak, and had he replied to his hon. and gallant Friend he would have been precluded from speaking for the remainder of the evening. [Colonel Jervis stated that he had made no charge of negligence against the right hon. Gentleman.] With respect to the relations existing between the War Department and the India Office, he (Mr. Hardy) could only say that he had never found any difficulty in carrying on whatever business had to be done. On the contrary, he had always met with ready attention from the India Office whenever a subject was brought under their notice. It was true that a dispute had long existed between the two Offices with regard to the price India ought to pay for recruits; but it had been referred for settlement to a Committee of which Mr. Bouverie was made Chairman, and he regretted that he was not now a Member of the House. The difficulty was one which required the most careful consideration; and, as the negotiations were still going on, it was impossible for him to express an opinion on it at present. With regard to the length of service, there was, he believed, no occasion for disagreement. It was quite obvious to all parties that a longer period of service than three years was desirable; otherwise the cost of sending out recruits to India would become excessively heavy. With regard to the question of Warrants, there could be no doubt that the fixing of allowances, &c., ought to be left to those who had the control of the money in India. No doubt difficulties might arise in consequence of the difference in the circumstances of the two countries, but he was not aware that any had arisen. The Commander-in-Chief in India was always connected with the Army at home, and if there were any difficulties they would, no doubt, be brought under the notice of the War Department. As for the grievances of the officers of Artillery, they were now settled, the new arrangement dating from April of the present year. Upon the whole, he could assure his hon. and gallant Friend that the relations between the two Departments were not of a complicated and injurious character, and he did not think there was any ground for the Motion which he had submitted to the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN stated that the differences between the India Office and the War Department appeared, from the investigation conducted by the Inter-Departmental Committee, to have arisen, in great measure, from the alterations which had been made in our military organization as well as from the complicated nature of the question itself. The reason why no conclusion had yet been arrived at by that Committee was that the whole circumstances of the case had changed in the course of their inquiry, and they could only decide in reference to accounts in arrear. With respect to the introduction of the short service system, whereby a recruit might be permitted in certain cases to pass into the Reserve after three years' service, nothing could be done by the action of a commanding officer unsupported by a higher authority, so that there was no fear of the new regulation being wantonly applied to the prejudice of the finances of India. His experience in the matter had been that the India Office was fully consulted in all the changes that took place, and he felt sure that this would continue to be the case. On the other hand, it was only right to say that it was out of the question for the Government of India to expect that their organization and system should be framed expressly to meet their ideas. India must hold the second place in our consideration, but he was sure that both the Secretary of State and the Commander-in-Chief would show every desire to meet the requirements of India as far as it was possible for them to do so.

GENERAL SHUTE said, he was glad to find that the grievances as regarded the majors of the Royal Artillery quartered in India had at length been disposed of. After three Royal Commissions had sat unsuccessfully as regarded promotions in that branch of the service, it had been found impossible in the Artillery, in consequence of having no system of purchase, to procure a full flow of promotion, and various plans had been adopted in order to remedy that state of things. Some years ago, with that view, it was suggested majors were unnecessary, and forthwith all the majors were made lieutenant-colonels. Lately, however, it had been found desirable, partly with the same object, to provide the Artillery with majors, and, accordingly, all the first captains had been made majors; but they complained—and, as he thought, with justice—that those in India did not receive major's allowance, and that in England majors of Horse Artillery did not receive forage at the contract rate equal to that which was paid to officers of the same rank in the Cavalry branch of the service.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK remarked that the most persevering efforts had been made to show that for many years the system pursued by the War Office had been to make charges against the Indian Government which ought not to be borne by them, and that we had been charging for a number of soldiers who ought not to have been charged for. Some of the best informed witnesses had exploded that allegation from beginning to end; but it had since been repeated in every possible way in order to induce people to believe that that country was suffering under that grievance. He regretted that the House was not in possession of the results which had been arrived at by the intermediate Committee; but he believed it could be shown that there was no foundation for any of these charges. The cost of bringing back from India men who, under the short service system, claimed their right to pass into the Reserve at the end of three years and replacing them by other men from home, was, without doubt, great; but he thought it might be avoided by giving the short service men the option, before the time for embarkation came, of transferring themselves to home battalions, or if they went out to India, of re-engaging after the expiry of their short term of service for other six years on receipt of a small bounty.

COLONEL JERVIS, in explanation of what had fallen from the Secretary of State for War, said the officers would not be satisfied with payment from the 1st of April last; what they claimed as a right was payment from the date of the Warrant. With the permission of the House, he would withdraw his Amendment. ["No, no!"]

ARMY (RECRUITS).

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD ELCHO said, that he was reluctant again to obtrude himself on the notice of the House on the Army question, and the more so as he should stand between the House and Supply. The present Government had not abused the power of their majority by taking away, as the late Government had done, the time-honoured privilege of bringing forward grievances on Supply, and he thought, therefore, that Members should be chary in its exercise. His right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, speaking of his (Lord Elcho's) former Motion, said, that although it was of national importance, it was not urgent. He ventured to think that if the Army was in an unsatisfactory condition, it was a matter of urgency to endeavour to set it right, and the "scare" that had since then occurred, and which had set all Europe and our Foreign Office in a tremor, justified this view. We could not afford to wait for the uncertain results of an uncertain future for the 80,000 Reserve men whom the hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) had told them they would have, under the Brigade dépôt system, in 10 or 12 years. 10 or 12 years! He would be a bold man who would say what will then be the form of the map of Europe, or who would, in the present state of European armaments and feeling, be content to wait and do nothing with our Army as it was. He therefore should submit to the House a Motion which naturally followed from the facts elicited in the discussions they had had on Army matters; but before doing so he would shortly summarize those facts, as it was only by statement, re-statement, repetition, and so-called "damnable iteration," that these things could be dinned into the mind and heart and conscience of the nation; and in bringing these matters before the public he was doing good service to the Government by preparing the public mind for measures which, though disagreeable, were inevitable if the Army was to be put on a proper footing. What, then, were the facts that had been thus elicited in debate? 1st. As to the Artillery, instead of having, as was stated, 336—horse-artillery and field-guns fully manned and horsed—it had been shown that we had only men and horses enough for 120 on a war establishment, and that 5,000 more artillerymen and 8,000 horses would be required to complete the remainder; that as regarded the Infantry, we had on the Home establishment 10,000 men less for the current year than we had in 1853, while the Army Estimates had increased during the last 22 years from £9,000,000 to £13,500,000. Our regiments now, instead of being solid, homogeneous bodies of men as they were in 1853, containing a minimum of 850

and a maximum of 1,200 rank and file, were mere skeletons having a minimum of 520, and a maximum of 820 in India; thus the minimum of 1853 was greater than the maximum of 1875. To fill up these skeleton battalions to an effective war strength, it had been shown that we had not much more in reserve than half of the number of the men required, and that of these three-fourths were half-trained Militia. It had further been shown that if we deducted lads under 20, and one-fifth for casualties—a very small reduction, as he knew that Lord Raglan used to say that they considered themselves lucky in Spain when they could turn out three-fourths of their total nominal strength—we could only bring 30,000 bayonets into the field for home defence and for the re-inforcement of our Indian and Colonial establishments. Lastly, it had been shown that the Recruiting Reports when read without the qualifying sentences revealed a most unsatisfactory state of things, and that the Inspector General of Recruiting looked with alarm to the time, rapidly approaching, when the full strain of the short-service system would be felt. But the most important fact elicited as yet was the admission of the Secretary of State for War that 30 per cent of our Infantry were “very unsatisfactory.” [Mr. GATHORNE HARDY: I said of the recruits.] He was certainly reported and understood to say of the Infantry; but in any case the number of boys and very unsatisfactory men now serving was admitted to be very large. Now, it was with these that his Resolution proposed to deal. It was as follows:—

“That, while expressing no opinion as to the necessity or expediency of enlisting or training immature lads for the service of the Crown, with a view to their ultimate development into efficient manhood, this House is of opinion that no youth under twenty years of age should be reckoned an effective soldier and borne, as such, on the Army Estimates; and this House is further of opinion that the number of youths under twenty years of age enlisted, and serving in each arm of the Service, should be annually and separately stated in the Estimates.”

The House would observe that his Resolution dealt with two branches of the subject, that of recruiting and that of efficiency. With regard to the first of those questions, he observed that a gallant General opposite (Sir George Balfour) had given Notice of an Amendment to the effect that before adopting his (Lord Elcho's) Resolution certain things recommended by the Royal Commission of 1866 should be tried. When recently at Aldershot an officer had said to him—“I see Sir George Balfour is going to fire a lot of small shot into you,” his reply was—“That small shot was a very good thing at times, that without it one could not kill snipes; and the gallant General appeared to think that without his Amendment they could not bag small boys.” He had no objection whatever to the Amendment, except that it in no way touched his Motion, for he invited no opinion as to the age at which lads should be enlisted. His own opinion, however, was, as he had stated on a former occasion, that it was a most extravagant system to enlist boys of 16, 17, and 18 years of age, who, by the time they had grown up into effective soldiers, would have cost the country an enormous sum. But if the Secretary of State for War, in the present condition of the labour market, thought it necessary to maintain nurseries and training-schools for soldiers, he could only enter his protest against the system as being a very expensive one. It was, then, to the second part of his Resolution that he wished specially to direct the attention of hon. Members, and on that part of it he should ask the House to pronounce an opinion.

MR. SPEAKER reminded the noble Lord that as the House had negatived the previous Amendment, no division on the present Resolution could be taken.

LORD ELCHO regretted that the Forms of the House would not permit a division to be taken on the question, as many hon. Members had expressed their intention of supporting the Motion, and he had himself said that if he could get anyone to accompany him into the Lobby he would divide the House upon it. As it was, he gave Notice that if alive and in the House next year he would again bring this question forward, unless he found, as he hoped would be the case, that the Secretary of State would accept the principle of his Resolution. It was, in fact, only an extension of that which the House had unanimously adopted in 1871, when it was agreed, on the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens), that no soldier under 20 years of age should be sent upon foreign service. He now asked the House—for the sake of the boys themselves, for the sake of humanity, for the sake of the Army, and for the security of the Empire—to declare that no boy under 20 should be regarded as an effective soldier at home. All authorities, military, medical, lay, foreign as well as English, agreed that until he had attained the age of 20, a lad was not fit to be classed as an effective soldier. He should not trouble the House with quotations upon this point, his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury having gone so fully into the physiology of the question in 1871, and again the other night, when he so eloquently and pathetically described his visit to the museum at Netley Hospital, where he saw the gristly—for they were not osseous—skeletons of the immature soldier-lads whom our system had sent to a premature grave. All that he would say further upon this point was that Dr. Parks, of Netley, in his work on Military Hygiene, said that soldiers under 20 years were not fit even for the heavy duties of peace; that he had met Sir William Fergusson, the celebrated London surgeon, the other day, and asked him at what age an English lad was well-grown and fit for hard work, and his reply was—"He did not think there was much wrong with the old English law which fixed maturity at 21." He also held in his hand a letter from the late Chaplain General, Mr. Gleig, whose name could nowhere be mentioned without honour, whose experience of soldiers in war under the Duke of Wellington, and whose life since had been so long and usefully spent in their midst, gave the greatest value to his words. Mr. Gleig said—

"You did not hazard a statement upon the constitution of the Army to which I do not entirely subscribe. It is nonsense to talk of the necessity of enlisting boys—otherwise we should have no Army at all. Better be without an Army than run the risk of being involved in war with a force at our disposal that would melt away through sickness and the inability of the men to carry their packs and ammunition, without giving the enemy the trouble to beat us in the field."

Instead, however, of pursuing the military argument further, he would rather refer to every man's daily experience in ordinary life as to the physical capabilities of youth and manhood. He was addressing an Assembly where possibly some who heard him might have pulled in the University boat-race. Now, he was no betting man; but had he been so, he would not have minded betting that no youth under 20 had pulled in that race, or that nine-tenths of those who had done so were over 20. The Secretary of State for War was reported to have said, the other night, that the labour of a lad of 18 was worth as much as the labour of a full-grown man; but, as the right hon. Gentleman shook his head, there was no doubt some mistake in the report. He would, however, confidently appeal to any Member of the House acquainted with mining, ship-building, agricultural labour, or factory work—in short, any occupation requiring much physical labour—to say whether a man was ever regarded as full-grown, or obtained a full-grown man's wages, till he was 20 or 21 at least. Why, an apprentice was bound until he was 21. A right hon. and gallant Admiral (Sir John Hay) cheered that statement, and that reminded him of the Arctic Expedition. He should like to know how many lads under 20 were going there as able seamen? Not one, he felt sure. Similar considerations prevailed with regard to animals. Who would think, for instance, of running a two-year-old against the Derby three-year-olds? The hon. Members for Mid Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) and Dorset (Mr. Sturt) differing upon other points connected with horses, would, at any rate, be agreed upon that point; and if his hon. Friend the Member for Dorset were to become a more successful breeder of horses than by his own account he appeared to have been, and were to run a two-year-old against a three-year-old, it was he that in such case would not dare to look his mares in the face. Who would think of riding a three-year-old across country, or putting one in the ranks of our Cavalry? In Germany Cavalry horses were not thought effective until they were five years old; and in a recent work, the Remontirung of the German Army, it appeared that the horses under six years of age had lasted only a short time in the late war. Finally, let him refer to game preserving. There were doubtless many game preservers who heard him; he asked them would they hire lads of 17, 18, 19 as watchers to keep off poachers and preserve their pheasants? Now, he might go on thus multiplying examples from ordinary daily life as to the comparative inefficiency of immature and full-grown creatures; but he would be satisfied by asking whether they would continue to treat their soldier boys differently from what they did their horses, and be satisfied to protect their Empire by means which they would not consider sufficient for the protection of their pheasants? It would, however, be well that he should anticipate one or two arguments that were likely to be brought against the position he had taken up. On the very morning after he had given his Notice an article appeared in The Times denouncing it as a monstrous Motion. No doubt, it was a high compliment to him that, almost before the ink with which the reporter recorded the Notice was dry, a leading article was penned with regard to it. This showed how his shot had told. The article drew attention to the Motion "as a specimen, voluntarily offered by its author, of the accuracy and the spirit of such attacks as were made the other night upon the present state of the Army;" and it added that some patience was required in dealing with such criticisms. It stated that a Return had recently been laid on the Table of the House showing that the average age of the Infantry recruits was 19 years and nine months; and this, it said—

"Was within three months of the very 20 years for which Lord Elcho contended. We have surely a right to ask with some urgency on what principle assertions are thus persistently reiterated which are inconsistent with the plain facts and figures officially and responsibly placed before us."

Now, anything more misleading than all this had never been published by a leading journal. This was no question whatever of an average. The question was whether the age of 20 ought not to be absolutely the age under which no recruit should be reckoned as effective, and when taken to task, as it had been, by The Pall Mall Gazette, The Times tried to back out by saying that—

"The only objection to the conclusiveness of their reply can be that an average may be composed of extremes, and that it is possible a few of the recruits may be too old and a great number of them too young."

But he had no fear that either the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War or any other Member of the House would take The Times' view of averages, which had nothing whatever to do with the question at issue. There was, however, a graver matter to which he wished to call attention—namely, a remarkable speech of His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge delivered on a remarkable occasion. The occasion was a dinner at Willis's Rooms, given by his hon. and gallant Friend the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works (Sir James Hogg), to celebrate the excellence of his administration, and at which, to bear testimony to it, he had secured the presence of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge. Now, he (Lord Elcho) had the honour of submitting his Motion on the Army to the House of Commons on the 20th April, and this dinner took place on the 24th. His Royal Highness was reported to have said—

"I must confess I have been somewhat staggered by many of the assertions which have been brought to my notice, and on this point I may be permitted, very cursorily, to remark that yesterday, in the course of my professional duties, I had an opportunity of going to see as much as I could of the troops at Aldershot, and all I can say is that, while deprecating war and hoping the necessity may not arise, I am perfectly prepared to-morrow, at five minutes' notice, to take every man of that force with me and to go anywhere, without seeing any reason why they should not perform their duty just as well as the British Army has ever done in times past."

This passage was printed in italics in a leader in The Times newspaper, and was followed by this remark—

"That, it appears to us, is a very strong declaration. It recalls some famous military phrases, and His Royal Highness must have well understood its significance."

The famous military phrases here alluded to must necessarily have meant the famous saying of the Duke of Wellington, who, speaking of the army he had in Spain, said that with it "he could have gone anywhere and done anything."

Now, this passage in the Duke of Cambridge's speech was so important that he (Lord Elcho) wished to analyze the force that was reviewed by His Royal Highness at Aldershot. In so doing he would speak with the utmost respect of the Duke of Cambridge. He had the honour of knowing His Royal Highness, who had always been very kind to him. There was no man for whom he entertained a higher respect; there was no man whom the country more highly esteemed. His Royal Highness was ever forward in the cause of charity, and whenever he appeared before a Committee or Commission on Army matters, it was admitted by all that no man was so conversant with all the details of the Army as His Royal Highness. The Pope had recently said that the nations required a lamp, as those did who visited the Catacombs, and that he held a lamp to give light to the world. He (Lord Elcho) thought that a visitor to Aldershot also required a lamp. This he held in his hand in the form of the Aldershot Field-state, and he proposed to turn its light upon His Royal Highness's speech. It was no doubt somewhat difficult to obtain information upon these subjects, as His Royal Highness had told the officers at Aldershot that they should "wash their dirty linen at home," as he expressed it. He (Lord Elcho) might also mention that, as one of the Council of the United Service Institution, he, after the recent three days' discussion they had there on recruiting, was summoned to consider a message from the Duke of Cambridge, their President, to the effect that, in his opinion, it was desirable that the discussions at the Institution should be confined to scientific subjects. But the Council, thinking in a free country free speech should not be discouraged, dissented from His Royal Highness's view, and unanimously agreed that the discussions should continue as heretofore, controlled only by the Chairman of each meeting. But let him first, in these days of selection, state that his information was not obtained from any official. He got it from a gentleman who knew as much as any official upon these matters, and that was the "man in the street." There was only one person who knew more about these things, and that was the Prussian military Attaché. Therefore, let it not be said that he (Lord Elcho) was telling tales out of school. Foreign nations knew every gun, every horse, and every man in the service of this country, what was efficient, and what was not; the only person ignorant of these things was the British taxpayer. He now came to the state of things at Aldershot, and he would read some extracts from the Field-state of the 23rd April. He had headed these extracts "His Royal Highness's Five Minutes' Army." The total on parade—all ranks—was 7,208 men; the casualties, which included sick, on guard, and other duties, were 3,046; that made a total of 10,254. The 7,028 on parade included Artillery, Cavalry, Engineers, Military Train, &c. He would take the

Artillery first. There were six batteries, one of them being a horse battery and the other five field-batteries, making a total of 36 guns. The war establishment of one horse and five field-batteries at 230 men and 250 horses for a horse-battery, and 269 men and 253 horses for a field-battery, would require 1,575 men and 1,515 horses. There were on parade 571 men and 510 horses. This Army, therefore, which was prepared to go anywhere and do anything at five minutes' notice, required 1,004 men, or, including 378 casualties, 626 men and 967 horses, including 38 casuals, to complete the 36 guns to a war establishment; and we had, it should be remembered, no reserve of men or horses in the Artillery, which was now considerably below its peace establishment. The total of the Cavalry on parade was 877 men, the number of the casualties was 767, making a total of 1,644 men for three regiments. The horses on parade were 820, casuals 181—total, 1,001, which gave 543 men without horses. In the Cavalry also we had no reserves of men or horses. On the last occasion when he had the honour of addressing the House on these matters he said that Infantry was the substance of an Army; he would now show its state on parade at Aldershot. The total Infantry of all ranks that paraded before His Royal Highness on this occasion was 5,332. There were three brigades made up of 11 regiments; seven of these regiments had depôt companies attached to them; including casualties, 1,603, the total of the Infantry was 6,935 of all ranks. Having a detailed state of the 3rd Brigade, he found that the total of all ranks was 1,947. The field officers were 8, the company officers 70, regimental staff 4, sergeants 115, band, drummers, and pioneers 316, making a total of 513, or about one-fourth, to be deducted from the 1,947 of all ranks to get the number of rank and file, which was thus found to be 1,434, including depôt companies attached to three of the regiments. If, then, he deducted one-fourth for officers, non-commissioned officers, band, &c., from the 5,332 of all ranks on parade, and if he further deducted 420 men for the seven depôt companies, calculated at 60 men per depôt—a very moderate calculation, as the proper strength of a depôt was 140 of all ranks—and if he further deducted 20 per cent for men under 20 years or unsatisfactory, making 730, the total of 5,332 men of all ranks on parade was thus reduced to 2,954 effective bayonets, or an average for 11 regiments of 267 men per regiment. Such then was, when fairly analyzed, the actual state of the Army with which, at five minutes' notice, His Royal Highness was prepared to go anywhere. He had every respect for His Royal Highness's courage; but he could not entertain a like respect, under the circumstances, for his discretion, and he should be sorry to see him embark on so forlorn a business. It might, perhaps, be said that the calculations he had given the House were those of a civilian, and not to be trusted; but he held in his hand the statement of a General Officer of great experience. He dared not give his name in these days of general selection, otherwise his name would give great weight to his statement. He sent this field-state to him and asked his candid opinion in regard to His Royal Highness's Aldershot Army, and here was his reply—

"The Infantry seen by His Royal Highness at Aldershot was composed of 11 battalions, with seven depôts of affiliated regiments, which, when the depôt centre system is in full operation, would be at their respective centres. Yet, notwithstanding these accidental additions, the 11 battalions, which, with one added, should make four brigades for service, made up scarcely more than one and a-half. Each of these battalions at Aldershot (and they would be presumably first for service) requires about 600 men to complete it to the fixed war establishment. The process of so doing is as follows:—Each battalion should have 24 drivers, with 48 draught horses, to take charge of 17 carts and waggon. These 24 men have to be selected and instructed, and this was imperfectly done in about six weeks before the Autumn Manœuvres, and not with satisfactory results. The 30 per cent of men described by the Secretary of State as being very 'unsatisfactory' would then have to be turned over to some depôt, and men from the Reserves would have to be found, allotted to different battalions, and orders sent them to join their regiments from all parts of the country. There being only 7,829 men in the First Reserve, recourse must be had to the half-trained Militia Reserves. These exhausted, volunteering would have to be resorted to, there being no power to transfer men arbitrarily from one regiment to another. The regiments left behind will be absolutely broken up, leaving scarcely sufficient to begin organizing new battalions upon. Simultaneously with this delay in getting together the personnel will be the issue of all the materials necessary for war—some having to be drawn from one place, some from another, but chiefly from Woolwich Arsenal, fully occupied in fitting out artillery. Now could all this be done in 24 hours, and done at the same time for the Cavalry, Artillery, Engineers, Supply, Transport, and Medical Departments? Or is there any reasonable assurance that even the 11 battalions at Aldershot could be brought to a war footing in six weeks or two months? Preparations for the Autumn Manœuvres took twice that time, and preparations are now making for the Manœuvres in September."

He thought the light he had thus ventured to throw on the Aldershot Force would show that the Army in its present condition could not inspire the country with confidence. It would indeed be well if our Foreign Office were to let the Government of Belgium know that, while prepared at all times to fulfil our Treaty obligations, and maintain the integrity of their kingdom, we must be allowed to do so in the only way we now could, and that was with our Navy; for in the present transition state of the Army we could not undertake to send them any help on land. We could not risk another Walcheren. He now passed to another part of His Royal Highness's speech. He was further reported to have said—

"It would be very acceptable to me, as to all military men, to see the ranks better filled; but this is a question which rests with the House of Commons."

So much for His Royal Highness's feeling and opinion as to numbers; now as to age—

"We have heard a good deal lately of our recruits. . . . Now I freely admit that I decidedly prefer men of 20 years of age as recruits to younger men. There cannot be two opinions on that point. . . . In former times . . . we had 30 or 40 men as recruits where now we have 100 or 150, because we have short service. . . . I should very much prefer to see a regiment composed entirely of old seasoned men."

Now, here they had an apparent discrepancy between the first and the second parts of His Royal Highness's speech. Which of these two views were they to take as the real view of His Royal Highness? The Spectator had been writing lately of "double-barrelled brains." All men, it was said, had two brains, separate and distinct; one on one side of the head, and the other on the other. These two did not always work in harmony and unison, and sometimes one brain did not work at all. Now it appeared to him that His Royal Highness was like many sportsmen—better with his second barrel than his first; and he preferred to take the second part of His Royal Highness's speech as the true real expression of his mind. He would accept it as the true version of the state of the Army. There remained two other points on which objection to his Motion might be taken. It might be said that if they drew the line at 20, there would be a difficulty in getting at the real ages of the men; but this difficulty was met by a suggestion that had been made to him by a staff-surgeon of great experience in recruiting — namely, that the inspecting surgeon should be left to decide as to the age and fitness of recruits to be borne on the effective strength of the Army, taking as his standard what a well-grown English lad of 20 ought to be. Thus, there might be cases of well-grown youths of 19 being admitted to the effective list, and of undeveloped lads of 20 being still kept on the non-effective roll. The last possible objection he had to touch upon was, that if his Resolution were to be adopted it would break down the whole system of the Army, and it would be necessary to resort to some other. That was not his business; all he wanted was to have an effective Army, and induce those who were responsible for these matters to endeavour to put things on a better and sounder principle. He had now done. He did not invite the House to affirm any difficult or abstract proposition. It was a simple common-sense matter. What he asked was that soldiers to be effective should be effective men. They were supposed to be so, for if they went to war, they would have to do men's work, and to contend against full-grown men. He asked, then, that this Empire, its honour and its interests, should be entrusted to the keeping of its manhood only, and not to its boyhood, who would have to contend against the manhood of other nations. He did not ask them to interfere with the system of recruiting; he did not ask them to touch the brigade depôts, that tender plant which the hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) so poetically told them, the other night, was springing up and would soon bear fruit, and which he so pathetically implored them not to root up and destroy. He did not ask them in any way to fix what the strength of our Army should be; that was a matter for the Ministry alone. All he asked was that none but effective men should be borne on the effective list, and they should be separately stated in the Estimates. True, they now could, by searching in Blue Books and Parliamentary Returns, get at the number of men under 20; but it would greatly simplify matters if these were to be, as he proposed, separately borne on the Estimates, as colts in training. This, he thought was an absolutely reasonable request, and he believed it would be the first step to improvement. His anxious wish was to make the Army, whatever might be its strength, really effective and reliable. What he wanted was a real, not a paper Army—a reality, not a sham.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR observed, that he was precluded by the Forms of the House from moving the Amendment which he had placed on the Paper, but the object he had in view would be equally as well attained by making remarks on the statements of the noble Lord the Member for Haddingtonshire (Lord Elcho). He could only assure the House that it was not to fire small shot as the noble Lord had mentioned, for if he had any hostile intent he would use the projectiles which he, as an Artilleryman, would have at his command. So far from hostilities, it was friendly support to the efforts which the noble Lord had made for so many years to render the Army efficient, that he now desired to give. The details and references entered in the Amendment, applied to the Report of the Recruiting Commission of 1866, over which Lord Dalhousie presided, and had in view this one object of proving to the House that every defect in the recruiting of the Army, which the noble Lord's Motion set forth, had been pointed out in the Report of that Commission; and if, therefore, the reforms had not been carried out as recommended, it became the duty of the House to hold the authorities responsible for not having acted. His object was the same as that of the noble Lord: to fix on the military authorities their proper responsibility for allowing defects to exist, which the Commission had then traced out, and were now admitted to exist. He fully agreed with the noble Lord as to the mistaken course followed at present in enrolling as effective soldiers the young lads under 20, who were not fit to bear the fatigues and duties which our soldiers must endure whether in the field or in garrison. He regretted that our ranks were recruited with lads of that description; but unfortunately the immaturity of our soldiers was no new complaint. The Report of the 1866 Commission stated that in the year before the Commission sat, out of 5,600 men sent to India, 2,003 were under 20, and more than one half under 21. The Report strongly urged that no man should be sent abroad under 20, and none unless thoroughly trained as soldiers. It was important, as the noble Lord had stated, on the advice of a medical officer, that the sole criterion for a soldier's fitness should be physical ability to bear fatigues, and not the mere age; but this was a prominent point in the Report of the Commission, and in order to get rid of that fruitful source of deceit, from the limitation as to age, it was urged that the standard of age at 18 should cease to be fixed on for reckoning service. So far from attending to these recommendations, the authorities had disregarded them. He held in his hand a most important Return, signed by the Adjutant General; it was No. 271, of 1871, moved for by the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North), which gave the ages of the men of the 5th Regiment destined for India, which showed 472 of all ranks of non-commissioned officers and men to be under 20 years of age, and one third of the privates under 19 years of age, and more than one-half under 20. And last year it was proved before the East India Finance Committee, that large numbers of recruits had been sent out to India very imperfectly trained, and many with less than one month's training. On these points he and the noble Lord were entirely in harmony, and both had in view the one essential object of fixing responsibility on some one. He well remembered the arrival at Madras, during the Mutiny, of a battalion of Rifles almost entirely composed of boys, and of far less weight and physical powers than the small Madras Sepoy, so that for two or more years they had to be nursed at a great cost. It was, in his opinion, a wise and right step on the part of the noble Lord to raise this question of physical fitness, and he hoped it would result in fixing on some one the responsibility for the efficiency of the recruits. It was useless to deny that of late the number of young men in the ranks of the European Force in India had been increasing, for the medical Reports showed this fact. In 1862, out of a total strength of which the medical Reports treated, there were 2,360 under 20; in 1864, out of 55,083, there were 1,533 under 20; in 1868, out of 47,332, there were 2,258; and these had gradually increased; for out of 52,531 in 1869, there were 3,563 under 20; and out of 49,909 in 1871, there were 4,496; and in 1872, the latest year for which there were Returns, there were 3,467 under 20, out of 49,854. It was, therefore, to be hoped that the later Returns would show more satisfactory results, so far as the mere age of the men could be used as the standard of fitness. But until they had some responsibility placed on some authority for the entire fitness of men serving in the ranks, as to their physical ability to bear all fatigues, they ought at least to be assured that none should be counted as soldiers under the regulating age of 20. Those proofs established an ample justification for the noble Lord in bringing forward this question; indeed, the public mind was anxious at the present time with regard to the efficiency of the Army, all the more so because such contradictory statements were made about the physique of the men. He could only express a wish that the authorities at the War Office, responsible for this important duty, would come forward with their distinct ideas expressed on paper, so that it might be ascertained to what extent they held themselves responsible. He concurred most fully in what the noble Lord had said as to the extravagant organization of some parts of the Army. At present they had many more Infantry officers—at least 1,000—in excess of the number they had in January, 1854, when they had a larger force of Infantry privates than they had at present. For this smaller strength the Infantry battalions were about 37 in excess of those in 1854, and the number of the companies about 500 more than in that year. The result was that they had battalions and companies mere skeletons, with very inefficient means for filling up the attenuated cadres in case of need; whilst in peace they had not the means of training officers and men in the efficient manner which strong battalions and strong companies ensured, and in case of war they would take the field with thinned ranks. Until the Army was placed on a more satisfactory formation, the public ought not to be asked that the present large expenditure should be increased. With improved organization, there would be funds available out of the existing large outlay, which would be most useful in making good those defects which all desired to have remedied. The noble Lord's remarks about the deficiencies in men and horses for our field guns—336 in number—were greatly exaggerated. It was monstrous to have 40 horses and 40 men to a gun in our Artillery, when 20 horses and 20 men would be a fair proportion. Napoleon never went beyond 30 horses and 30 men, and Wellington, within a few years after the close of his campaigns, in reviewing the Artillery establishments, denounced the then proposed organization as extravagant, such as even this wealthy country could not stand, and advised, as one mode of lessening the cost of batteries, to form them of eight guns, instead of six guns, as at present. Since then the whole of the Artillery had been re-organized into the expensive form of brigades, whereby senior officers had been multiplied, and other liabilities created, so as to make the present Artillery far more costly than was ever proposed when the Duke of Wellington, as Master General of the Ordnance, opposed the former organization as far too costly for this country. There was great force in what the noble Lord had said as to our deficiency in the number of Infantry privates as compared with the numbers immediately prior to the war with Russia. In the beginning of 1854 there were 98,230 privates of Line Infantry, and 5,510 privates of Infantry of the Guards, and these were exclusive of the privates of Infantry of the East India Army. At present there were only 4,970 privates of Infantry of the Guards, and 94,370 privates of Infantry of the Line; but these included all privates in India, now that the Indian European forces were merged in those of the Home Army. Thus we had more battalions and more companies than in 1854, for nearly 10,000 fewer privates. The noble Lord had said very justly that such a Force as they had was quite insufficient if they were obliged to take the field against Germany. In 1870 they were very near sending a force to the Continent, but he hoped they would never have to do so. Taking the Infantry as the standard by which to measure our means of offence, then our Army was indeed not only small, but scattered. Out of the Infantry privates, there were 6,390 in depôts, 13,390 in the Colonies, 39,000 in India, and 35,680 only at home with their battalions. As these were only the fixed Establishments, there must always be some wanting to complete. Now, the Home battalions being 70 in number, formed, without the depôts, into 360 companies, there was, on an average, only 510 privates in a battalion, or less than 64 in a company. It could not be surprising that, with such attenuated battalions, according to the Establishment, there should be, as the noble Lord had stated, still greater attenuation when these battalions were paraded at Aldershot. The 5,332 Infantry of all ranks that recently paraded, as the noble Lord stated, before His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, would not form 20 companies of German Infantry, instead of 11 battalions, as at Aldershot, with 88 companies. Here was a reform which could be effected in the direction followed in Germany. Nothing could be more beneficial to their Army than that of forming their present battalions, if they retained the number of 141, into strong companies of 150 privates, so as to keep up only 564 companies, instead of 1,028 as at present, exclusive of depôts, and the battalions would then consist of 600 privates, divided into four firing companies. In that way, instead of 168 weak companies in the Colonies there would be 82, and in India 260 companies instead of 400 as at present. In that formation there would be not only great economy, but great efficiency; and he would urge that whatever force they maintained it should from its reduced numbers be in the highest state of efficiency. Every effort should, therefore, be made to raise up their present Infantry force to that highest state of training, and he trusted the speech of the noble Lord would induce the Government to keep up whatever Force they might require, not only in the most efficient but in the most economical manner. It would be found that every Army was efficient in proportion to the economy with which it could be managed; or in other words, as it combined the greatest amount of efficiency with the smallest possible expenditure—it meant that though every want was supplied, yet no waste was permitted. Now, nothing could conduce more to economy than to diminish the present number of officers with battalions, or rather with companies; and instead of increasing them as they had been doing every year, those now kept up should be re-distributed, and it was only by an improved formation of the several branches of the Army that they could attain that economical end which the noble Lord advocated. His object in putting the Amendment on the Paper was not for the purpose of obstructing the efforts of the noble Lord, but simply to show that the measures recommended by the noble Lord had been already suggested, and neglected; in the hope, however, that the noble Lord would give his aid in having attention given to these possible economies and improvements, he gladly supported his Motion. The noble Lord had alluded to conscription; but he (Sir George Balfour) trusted they would never have recourse to that hateful system by which Continental Governments dragged men from every employment of the most important character to fill the ranks of the armies, totally disregarding of the losses and injuries thereby occasioned, leaving out of consideration the hideousness of the barbarous practice. Before such a measure was thought of, the utmost attention should be given to attain by civilized arrangements, the results which barbarous force secured on the Continent. One of the conclusions to which the Recruiting Commission, over which Lord Dalhousie presided, came to was, that the steps which they then took for the purpose of obtaining recruits were totally insufficient for keeping up the numbers and quality of men for our Army. The words in the Report were that—

“Under the present system the mode of raising recruits for the Army is not calculated either to develop the military resources of the country or to obtain a sufficient number of men from that class of the population which, in former years, used to enter the service, and which it would be most desirable to attract to its ranks.”

Before thinking of ballot or conscription they ought to place their voluntary system of obtaining men for service on as efficient a footing as they must do if they entertained the notion of taking men by force. The Germans depended on the universality of the obligations; but the French, with their former more limited requirements for men, had systematized their demands by means of their

38,000 communes. There every one being enrolled in the register of births and deaths under pain of civil forfeiture of rights could be laid hold of, and forced to try his luck against being conscripted. By this civil agency of a strictly enforced system of record in the civil registers of communes, and by keeping up the history of all from birth to death, the number who evaded the trial were but few, and necessarily of the lowest description, by reason of their forfeiture of civil rights following on the evasion. Now he maintained that they had in existence, in the form to which the Report of the Recruiting Commission referred, a machinery which, by means of their registration of births, deaths, and marriages, would enable them to apportion the country out in a far more perfect manner than was done under their present system of recruiting by dépôt centres. Those divisions for recording the condition of the people were peculiarly well suited for obtaining a thorough acquaintance with the available class which entered the Army. The entire area of 77,635,246 statute acres in the United Kingdom was divided into 789 superintending districts, and 4,004 registration sub-districts, and these again were, on the Decennial Census, sub-divided into about as many divisions as there were communes in France. In his opinion, recruiting appeared to be more of a civil than a military act. It was so in France and Germany; and, therefore, it ought to be withdrawn from the control of the the Commander-in-Chief, and placed under that of the Secretary of State for War, who should be responsible for supplying the Commander-in-Chief with the number and quality of men he required. This end could be attained by improving the existing registration, in order to obtain the aid which it was capable of being given in obtaining supplies of men. Another recommendation of Lord Dalhousie's Commission was, that in order to carry out the recruiting system more effectually, it would be necessary to provide one or more dépôts for the purpose of receiving immature youths, who, by careful training under skilful officers, and by good treatment, might be made fit to join the Army. His own view was, that they should have three of these dépôts, containing at least 4,000 youths each, out of which they could transfer

to the ranks a number of well-trained and efficient lads fit for service. Those depôts would, no doubt, involve expense; but considering that about one-third of the youths they now obtained for their ranks were physically defective, the depôt system would be found cheaper and better than their present system of having unfits in the ranks. Looking to the number of boys available in various ways, in the reformatories and industrial schools, it would be worth while for the Secretary of State for War to see whether these boys could not be turned to account in aiding to recruit the Army. That measure had been recommended by Mr. M'Gregor, so well known for his travels by sea, river, and lake, but still better known and appreciated for his active exertions in the cause of education, and philanthropic exertions in various ways, in connection with their poorer population, and also as regarded the destitute boys. Lord Dalhousie's Commission also inquired into this source of supply, and in their Report suggested an experiment similar to that tried for the Navy. Now, provided the cost of rearing boys, which in the Navy amounted to £70 per boy supplied to the ships, could be considerably reduced below that rate, the experiment of training boys for the Army might become another useful aid for filling our ranks. Lord Dalhousie's Commission had inquired most fully into the question of recruiting for India, and any one who read the paragraphs of the Report—and every one of its paragraphs was written by Lord Dalhousie himself—would see that service in that country was in great favour. In fact, recruiting for the 60,000 men they had in India could be carried on upon an entirely separate system to that for the Home Army. The House of Commons need never hear of it, nor need the Chancellor of the Exchequer be afraid of any call being made on him for its support. The ranks of the European Army in India were formerly filled up with ease; and it was to be regretted that we failed to use this favourable opening for obtaining men for India. Lord Dalhousie had a high opinion of the Militia as a defensive Force. He had himself formerly entertained doubts on that point. It was too late, however, to consider whether we should abolish this Force. The country had decided, and in his opinion the Secretary of State for War should therefore see that its efficiency was maintained. At present, out of 123,000 privates of which it consisted, one-third at least were absent from the inspection at the annual training. There was one regiment of Militia, commanded by the hon. and gallant Officer the Member for Bedfordshire (Colonel Gilpin), which was very efficient, and came nearer to the Establishment than any other Militia regiment in the service, both in respect to its completeness up to the Establishment, and to its fullness in numbers at training—particularly in giving more volunteers for the Line in proportion to its strength—than any other Militia corps. This was an example that ought to be followed. The necessity of looking carefully into the condition of that Force would be understood when it was known that the expenditure incurred upon the Militia was at least £15 for every man present at inspection, and if that sum were doubled, they could for £30 a man add the same amount of force, which now composed the Militia to the Regular Army. This was a great political question, and it involved the further question whether they were justified in doing away with the Militia altogether, or whether, on the other hand, they should raise that Force to a higher standard. Under any view, it was a wise and prudent course for Government to consider the measures which could give the country more efficient Forces than they at present obtained for the large outlay now incurred on their Military Estimates.

MR. SIDEBOTTOM: Though unacquainted with the professional technicalities involved in this subject and unable to claim any special knowledge whatever respecting it, I yet make no apology for trespassing upon the attention of the House with a few very brief observations, because the maintenance of the efficiency of our Forces both by land and sea appears to me to be of such supreme, such vital, and such transcendent consequence, that in comparison with this, most other subjects, however interesting and important they may be, are utterly paled and dwarfed into insignificance, and because it is, in my opinion, the bounden and imperative duty of every Member of this House whether he may sit on this side, or whether he may sit on that, and indeed of every man who bears the name of Englishman, to endeavour to assist in promoting such a great and desirable object. I am sure the House will entirely agree with what has been said by the Prime Minister, that our great object ought to be to render the Army as effective as possible, for it is a most peculiar one, and there is none other in the world like it, whether we consider the vast distances it has to explore, or the immense variety of climate and other conditions upon which health and life depend, it has to encounter. Now anything which on this subject falls from the noble Lord who has moved this Amendment to-night, in such an able and exhaustive speech, must always carry the greatest weight and be received with the utmost consideration and respect both by this House and the Country, and what in substance is the Amendment he asks us to adopt that—

“In the opinion of this House no youth under 20 years of age should be reckoned as an effective soldier and borne as such on the Army Estimates?”

Well, although in the presence of Gentlemen who can speak with so much higher authority, I certainly shrink from the intrusion of my own opinions on the attention of the House in reference to this somewhat technical matter, and wish rather to draw attention to the broader and more general principles as to the expediency and importance of maintaining our Army in an efficient state which I apprehend are involved in this Amendment, I beg, nevertheless, most respectfully, to ask the House whether these boys ought or ought not to be counted as effective soldiers? We heard from an eye-witness, the hon. and gallant Colonel opposite the Member for Renfrewshire, a most vivid description of the catastrophe which befel our arms at the Redan in consequence of our forces being composed mainly of these boys, instead of older and better seasoned soldiers; that description made a most powerful impression on my mind, and if it stood singly and alone, I think it might well cause us to reflect and to reflect seriously upon this important subject; but I submit that we have also the highest authority in the country on the side of this Amendment. The Duke of Cambridge, speaking at a dinner given by the Metropolitan Board of Works on the 24th of last month, paid a well-deserved tribute to the gallantry of the Army, and said he was prepared to take command of the troops at Aldershot immediately and go anywhere; but he also said—

“I decidedly prefer men of 20 years of age as recruits to younger men . . . though these would make very good soldiers after a time.”

In the course of the same speech he also said—

“When I see regiments which are not very strong in point of numbers it would be very acceptable to me, as to all military men, to see their ranks better filled . . . but this rests with the House of Commons and the electoral constituencies. If they will have the goodness to vote larger Estimates, there will be no great difficulty in providing additional numbers in the Army, and, so far as I am concerned, nothing will give me greater satisfaction.”

Now, this I humbly submit contains the very germ and essence of the whole matter. The Duke of Cambridge, gallant soldier as he is, is no doubt prepared to take command of the Army in its present state, and to go anywhere; but the question is whether such a man is to be allowed to run the risk involved in such self-sacrificing devotion; and whether the country is to run the risk of another disaster to its Arms such as that at the Redan? As His Royal Highness has so well said, the decision rests with this House, and it appears to me that the primary matter for our consideration is, ought we, or ought we not, to have our regiments filled with older and better seasoned men? If we ought, surely in a country like England, where such stupendous interests are at stake, there need not, and there ought not to be, any impossibility, or indeed much difficulty, in obtaining the men. As an extensive employer, I have often experienced difficulty in obtaining the number of operatives I have required, but the obvious and the usual plan adopted to overcome the difficulty in such cases is to raise wages, and this has generally the desired effect; and so with the Army, granted that you ought to have older, more mature, and better seasoned men, and then most certainly either by increase of pay, or if this be found ineffectual, then by some other means, into the consideration of which I will not weary the House by entering to-night, the men may be and ought to be obtained. At the same time, nothing can be further from my wish than to advocate reckless expenditure or extravagance; on the contrary, I would exercise the most rigid supervision to ensure economy in every Department; but I venture to think that above and beyond even this consideration, our primary and chief object ought to be to obtain real efficiency. Depend upon it the truest and wisest economy is to insure against losses, and can anyone estimate—dare any Gentleman in this House attempt to estimate—what would be our loss, if from any false economy, any ill-judged parsimony, any penny-wise and pound-foolish policy, we neglected to keep up the efficiency of the Army, and sooner or later in consequence suffered some really serious and grave disaster. Such a contingency will not endure reflection. We are the same people who sent forth those armies which first rolled back the tide of conquest and stayed for ever the hitherto resistless march of Napoleon's legions, or which in later times in this very Crimea—ere the men which filled their ranks had been replaced with those puny striplings which under our system of recruiting and absence of Reserves alone could be obtained—defended the gorges of Inkerman, against all the hosts of Russia, and carried our arms in triumph up the heights of Alma. Our population, our wealth, our credit, our material resources of all kinds are incomparably greater than ever; but the truth is, our very prosperity occasions our difficulties, for our various manufacturing and industrial occupations are so vast, and conducted on such an extended scale, they have created such a demand for labour, and the price of that labour is consequently so high, that one ceases to wonder at the difficulty experienced in obtaining recruits, for when in the manufacturing districts a man as an unskilled labourer can earn from 24s. per week upwards, and be amenable to no discipline whatever after the hours of work are over, there is no very great inducement for him to enlist in the Army at the present scale of pay and under present existing conditions. And this fact should not be lost sight of by those who are continually reminding us that our Army is the most expensive in the world, nor should they forget also that it is recruited entirely by voluntary enlistment, whilst in other services there is either the conscription pure and simple, or some other modified form of compulsory service. History teaches us that impatience of taxation and of military service have ever been the characteristics of democratic communities like our own, and affords numerous examples of the disasters to which they have led; but I venture to think that the patriotism and public spirit of the great mass of the English people will lead them willingly to make such sacrifices as may be necessary, and cheerfully to bear such burdens as may be requisite, provided they be satisfied that those sacrifices and those burdens are essential to the efficiency of our Army, and that they will not be made in vain. And though I do not for one moment wish to suggest or to imply that we ought to make any attempt to rival the prodigious armaments of our neighbours, well knowing that, even if desirable, such a thing is impossible, I nevertheless humbly submit that we cannot altogether ignore what is taking place and passing so near us, and if we cast our eyes across the narrow seas which encircle these Islands we shall perceive that we are at this moment confronted on the Continent with such a state of things as was never known before. A very large proportion of the whole able-bodied population of the most powerful nations on the Continent will soon be converted into a mass of trained soldiers, and though those nations are now happily at peace, it seems to me a peace which partakes of the character of the lull before the storm, or of that preternatural calm which so often precedes the outbreak of a mighty tempest, when the very elements seem awed and seem subdued by the prospect of the havoc which is to come. In Italy, in Austria, in Germany, and in Russia, enormous armies are on foot, which by pressing most heavily on the resources, and being a great tax upon the industry of those countries are in themselves a strong predisposing cause of war, whilst France—France, long considered the first and most powerful nation on the Continent—France has been made to bite the dust, and drink to the very dregs the cup of humiliation and disgrace, in a space of time of unexampled brevity. She has beheld the collapse of her long-cherished military power, and the forces of the foe in occupation of her fairest provinces; she has beheld his hostile standards float over the walls of Paris, and been compelled to accept an ignominious and disastrous peace at the dictation of a relentless conqueror, but does anyone suppose it probable, does anyone suppose it possible, that such a nation—a nation with so great a history, so proud of past achievements, so vain of martial prowess, and so apt to be intoxicated with military glory—will thus succumb and confess herself vanquished in one campaign? No, Sir; depend upon it we have as yet seen only the first acts of the great drama; the first was played out at Jena and Auerstadt, the second closed with Metz and Sedan, and it is vain to speculate either when the curtain will rise upon the next, or what may be its issue! it may be, that purified by disaster and refined by adversity the genius of France may once more be in the ascendant, or it may be that German solidity and Saxon steadiness will again prevail, but, however, this may be, though pray heaven we may escape the strife! I cannot forget that we are bound by solemn treaties, that we have international obligations to fulfil, and duties to perform, and though whether under the guidance of the illustrious statesman who at present presides at the Foreign Office, of his not undistinguished Predecessor, or of some future Minister, no effort will, we may rely upon it, be spared to preserve for us the inestimable blessing of peace, circumstances may any day occur, complications may at any time arise by which we shall unavoidably be involved in the conflict, unless prepared to sacrifice dignity, and prestige, and fame, and honour, and all those qualities which Englishmen will ever hold so dear. Depend upon it the surest way of preserving peace is to be prepared for war, Si vis pacem para bellum, and it is, therefore, in the true interests of peace, and the earnest hope that it may be long preserved that I most cordially and sincerely second the Amendment of the noble Lord.

Mr. J. HOLMS said, he wished the House to consider the humiliating position in which it was placed to-night. Ever since 1866 we, as a nation, had been considering proposals for remodelling our Army, and, as yet, we had not even advanced so far as to settle even the first step—namely, the age at which we would take our men; whereas the great Continental Powers were now only considering how best to arm, equip, and put in motion their vast forces, while one of them might be said to have raised the art of war to the position of a science. In 1866, Prussia astonished Europe by carrying her troops to the frontiers of Austria in four or five weeks. In 1870 she accomplished the same feat against France in 19 days, and he was informed she was now prepared to perform the same in only 12 days. Surely, this was enough to cause England to awake to a sense of responsibility in connection with the wretched condition of our Army? The question now under discussion was simply how we were to obtain, in the easiest manner, a supply of efficient men. Now, there were but three ways of obtaining men, as far as he was aware. The first was that of voluntary service for 21 years and a pension, commonly called long service; the second was by conscription or some other kind of compulsory service; and the third was voluntary short service, with high deferred pay in the reserve. Everybody who had carefully studied the history of European warfare since 1866 must have arrived at the conclusion that the long-service system was practically dead, and could not be revived. It was wholly unsuited to the requirements of modern warfare; and, moreover, it was so essentially immoral that no civilized country in the world retained it except ourselves. A Reserve system was the only efficient one; and the experience gained since 1866 had shown that the best age for soldiers on active service was from 20 to 32 years. He was glad that the question of conscription or some other form of compulsion had been introduced by the noble Lord to the notice of the House, and of the country. Although he (Mr. Holms) was entirely opposed to compulsion of any kind—because he believed it to be unnecessary—yet, he believed, the more the word “conscription” was used in the House and out of it, the more likely would they be to arouse the attention of the people, and to make them give serious attention to the condition of our Army. He believed that there was great misapprehension as to conscription. It was generally supposed that in Prussia all young men were, at the age of 20, called upon to serve in the Army; but the fact was that only one out of every three youths was so called upon to serve. Of course, in every country where there was compulsion, the first thing the Government considered was how far they could possibly shorten the term of service, and lighten the burden which such service imposed upon the people; but, still, wherever there was compulsion, it pressed very hard upon the nation. In Prussia they kept steadily in view two great principles, which were equally applicable, whether a country adopted voluntary service or compulsory service. Those two principles, which were utterly disregarded in this country, were these—First, that of perfecting the organization after they had obtained the men. He had already indicated how far Prussia had progressed in making her organization very perfect. What was the state of the organization of our Army? Let the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hardy) order 50,000 men of the British Army to concentrate at Dover, or at York, or at Carlisle, giving them a sudden notice, and the greatest amount of confusion would be discovered, and the want of organization laid open to the public view. Prussia took care to establish well-defined responsibility. She left something to the discretion of her generals; but, with us, the general had not even the discretion left to him to spend or to save a shilling. The second of the two great principles to which he had referred was, that wherever a country adopted a compulsory system, it should do everything it possibly could to shorten the period of service, and ease the labour of the soldier. The Prussians were making great progress in that respect, as well as in regard to their organization. That they might quickly turn out good soldiers they thought they ought to have good instructors. The position of the Prussian Army, in relation to its non-commissioned officers, was this—they had five schools established throughout Prussia, to enter which any young man of between 17 and 20 might apply, if he desired to make the Army his profession; and, having been admitted, he might study for three years; but, if he was capable of acquiring all the instruction they wished to give him in two years, instead of three, he might at once enter the service. That exemplified a principle which flowed through the Prussian Army—namely, that a man, by his energy, intelligence, and industry, might shorten processes and get the consequent advantages. If he had been in the school for two or three years, he must serve two years in the Army for each year that he had been in such school, added to the three years of ordinary military service. It followed that the non-commissioned officer would serve for 9 or 12 years in the Army, at the end of which time he had a right to civil employment. Another mode of obtaining non-commissioned officers in Prussia was by allowing men to rise from the ranks after their three years' service; and when they so aspired to the position of non-commissioned officers they were educated in their own barracks, and they were then engaged year by year by their commanding officers. If, during 12 successive years they were retained in the Army, and could show good service and good character, then they might remain in the Army without an annual engagement, or obtain civil employment. Those were the men who, so to speak, manufactured the raw recruits into soldiers. The authorities did not accept a recruit, unless he was capable at once of entering on the heavy work of drill and training, so that the raw material, so to speak, could at once be used. Although the term of service in Prussia was limited to three years, the average time in which they manufactured a soldier was from 20 to 22 months. The Prussians did what they could to raise the soldier—morally, intellectually, and socially—so as to send them home better citizens instead of worse. In truth, they might be said to have no standing Army at all; for all their thoroughly-trained soldiers were at home; the men in barracks were neither more nor less than in a training school. Real short service had never been tried in this country, because, in his judgment, short service meant that which now prevailed in Prussia—namely, 20 months' drill. But he went further and said that our working population was the best and brightest in Europe; and if Prussia could make Infantry soldiers in 20 months, we could, without exaggeration, make them in 18. Was England, however, to be a mere copyist in this matter, and have no notions of her own by which she could progress? In this country we had short hours for labour, and if it were known throughout the length and breadth of the land that we were willing to take recruits who were, so to speak, self-educated, and who had partly drilled themselves, we might obtain men who could at the end of one year, or even in less time, prove themselves to be good soldiers, in which case he saw no reason why we should not take men on such terms. The next thing that was essentially necessary was to raise the pay of the soldier. They had not to look to an extremely high rate of pay, but should have regard to what was the pay of the ordinary labourer throughout England, Scotland, and Ireland. That he estimated at about 16s. a-week. And what was the pay of an Infantry soldier, including clothing, medical attendance, barracks, &c., per week? Why, only 13s. 5d. Now, one might as well expect to purchase Consols at 90, when the price was higher, as to tempt men from better paid occupations at that rate of wages. To raise the Army to an attractive point, men should be paid £20 a-year, at least, during the four years they were in the Reserve—partly deferred thus—£10 a-year for the first three years, and £50 in the fourth year—we should, then, like Prussia, have a better class of men going back to settle amongst the community with a little capital and a stake in the country, instead of 12,000 or 15,000 deserters a-year between soldiers and militia-men. And, as in Prussia, the man who had served in the Reserve should have the first opportunity of claims to civil appointments. By that process the Army and Militia might be made to work in perfect harmony. There would then be only one system of recruiting, and we should not require more than 32,000 men a-year instead of 50,000. The truth was our whole system was founded on unsound principles. Of 100 men in the Prussian Army between the ages of 20 and 32, 65 were at home on furlough costing the country nothing, while 35 were in barracks being trained and drilled. We, however, had 80 men in barracks being drilled till they were sick of it, eight men at home on furlough, and a dozen in prison, hospital, or playing hide-and-seek in all directions. Now, the one of those systems he called sound and reliable, the other unsound. We should, he might further observe, bear in mind that we had an Indian Army to reform, which seemed to be at present in a very unsatisfactory condition. It was only on the 10th of March last that a letter dated the 12th of February appeared in The Times from its Calcutta Correspondent, which he should recommend hon. Members who took an interest in the subject to read. In that letter the Correspondent stated that the Indian Government could not put more than 30,000 men in the field, and that Scindia and Holkar together could put 50,000 men in the field. Then he made the significant remark that that by no means gave a full measure of the power of Scindia, inasmuch as he understood that he had adopted the short-service system, and was passing his men through the ranks back to the civil community. Thus, it would appear that the Native Princes of India, too, were stepping ahead of us, and acting upon the principle of having short service with a reserve. Under those circumstances, he looked forward with the greatest interest to next Session. It was impossible to disguise from ourselves that something must be done. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had remarked the other evening in reference to some observations which he had then made, that he thought he was too sanguine in the view which he took as to getting men. Well, he had since taken occasion of one or two batches of as intelligent men as any in London, who had come to him on public business, to make inquiries, and they told him that, under the scheme he proposed, there would be no difficulty in getting men. It would be well, he might add, that the working classes should be consulted on the subject during the Recess, for if they could be brought to co-operate with the military authorities, the difficulty would, he felt satisfied, be solved without much trouble. But be that as it might, as one, in common with others, who had some stake in the country he was most dissatisfied with the state of our Army. Nor would he flinch from maintaining the opinion that our condition in that respect was most dangerous, unwise, and undignified. If we were able to uphold our position in the future as in the past, we might, by a few words of advice, aid in preserving peace. He did not desire to see a great Army for the purpose of the acquisition of new territory. What he wished this country to possess was a moderate Army, established on such sound principles as to place us in a position of dignified security, both as regarded these Islands and in respect to India and our Colonies.

COLONEL LOYD-LINDSAY said, he believed the reason why the recruiting difficulty had been shirked and almost denied, in the face of overwhelming facts proving its existence, was to be found in the extreme unpopularity of the remedies which had been suggested. These remedies were an offer of larger pay and compulsory service for one or two years. The former remedy was a plain and simple one. Throughout the country the magistrates in quarter sessions had found it necessary to increase the pay of police-constables on account of the impossibility of getting men to serve at the old wages. The Town Council of Liverpool had recently raised the pay of the constabulary force in that city to 28s. 10d. per week, and at that scale of pay they employed over 1,000 men. Other large towns had done likewise. These public bodies offered inducements three times as great as those which the Inspector General of Recruiting was able to promise to recruits. Again, the railway companies throughout the kingdom employed 300,000 men, all drawn from the same class as our soldiers. These men were employed in the various capacities of policemen, pointsmen, signalmen, and guards, all of them receiving far larger wages than men could obtain for military service. The same observation held true of men employed in workshops, factories, mills, and yards. In fact, it was now impossible to obtain good soldiers to serve at the present rate of pay. If we did obtain them it would only be at a period of disastrous change in our national circumstances, from prosperity to adversity. The class of persons who found it most easy to obtain employment in this country were men who possessed good character and a fair amount of physical strength. It was a truism to say that; but it was necessary to repeat it to those who still continued to hope that soldiers would be found to serve at really less than half-pay. So long as England remained prosperous and active in all its commercial pursuits, the Army, under the present system, could only be recruited with men rejected from other employments. A proper estimate of the value of our Army was obtained, not by comparing its present with its former condition, but by comparing it with the Armies of other countries. In all those things which money could buy, our Army was superior to every other. Our Infantry were better armed and better clothed, our Cavalry better mounted, and our Artillery had better guns. But when we come to physique the comparison was by no means so favourable. The class of men who entered our Army were inferior both in character and bodily strength to those drawn by conscription into the Armies of foreign powers. Taught by the disasters of 1870-71 the French people had adopted conscription. This he believed to be a splendid law, so far as the Army was concerned, because under it you could lay your hand on the best men, and at the best ages—namely, from 20 to 40 years. But for the thousand and one interests which we in this country estimated as highly as that of the Army, it was a mischievous law, and one which he trusted would never be adopted in England. It was not required, because we could defend ourselves from invasion without it, and because we were rich enough to give men sufficient pay to induce them to be soldiers. Cavalry officers bought horses at three years when they could not get them for the regulation price at four years; and so the military authorities, when they found they could not enlist men at 18, took them at 17, and even in some cases, he believed, at 16 years of age, involving a sacrifice in both cases of efficiency, and a heavy extra charge upon the public, without commensurate advantage to the State. His noble Friend (Lord Elcho) proposed to strike off from the effective state of the Army all those under the age of 20; but he (Colonel Loyd-Lindsay) thought each man should be judged according to his own physical strength, and he maintained that many men of 18 were fit for soldiers although they had not reached the magical age of 20 years. He thought they should not fix a hard-and-fast line in this matter. The most successful experiment of modern times for the benefit of the public service had been that adopted by the Admiralty for manning the Navy. Now, the same plan, in his opinion, was no more favourable for providing sailors for the Navy than soldiers in the Army. In the matter of cost, indeed, the plan would work more advantageously for the Army than the Navy. An Act of Parliament enabled the Admiralty to engage boys of from 14½ to 16 years of age to enter the service, and to remain for 10 years from the time of attaining the age of 18. By this means 2,000 boys were passed every year into the Navy, and no difficulty would be experienced in doubling the number. The boys were kept for 15 months in a training ship, from which they were drafted into sea-going ships, and here it was that the treatment of the sailor and the Army recruit would differ. The recruit would not be drawn into any training institution, but be left for two years in his own village, earning his living, but receiving a small sum weekly, rising from 3*d.* to 6*d.* a-day. For this he would attend a few drills during the season, and with the number of local Volunteer Corps no difficulty would be experienced in this respect. None but boys of good character would be engaged, and these only with the consent of their parents. What the Army wanted was agricultural labourers in the ranks—men who could use the spade and the pick, and throw up a covert trenchlike workmen, and this knowledge the new class of recruits would be calculated to bring. They would soon be taught the use of the rifle when they entered the ranks. It might be asked if it was well to pay £30 or more for a man who would come untrained, or scarcely trained, as a soldier. To that he would answer that the Admiralty thought it worth while to spend £65 for every boy who passed out of a training ship into the Navy, and would never consent to abandon a system which secured to the service a class of sailors superior to that which they formerly obtained. The Royal Commission which reported on Recruiting in 1867, among other recommendations, made the following:—

“If the experiment (referring to training boys) is to be tried in the Army, some new establishment would be necessary which would be attended with considerable expense in the first instance, but we think that the success which has resulted in the Navy should induce Government to give full consideration to the subject.”

He thought the experiment might be tried, and better tried, without an establishment, which would involve great expense. It was establishments which ran away with the vast sums expended on our Army, and in no case, much less than in this, would he advocate a further development of establishments. Whatever money was paid for recruiting ought to go direct into the pockets of those they wished to draw into the service. But if the experiment was to be tried successfully, there was also wanted an improvement and extension in the mode of recruiting. When the brigade depot system was first spoken of in that House, the plan was received with the utmost favour; one Member after another expressed himself highly in favour of the scheme; and the reason why it was so much approved was because it was thought that the military authorities had established a recruiting machinery by which they could penetrate into the rural and agricultural districts, and that the good time so long looked forward to by colonels of regiments was at hand, when the agricultural labourer would enter the ranks of the Army. He would appeal to any Engineer officer in the House whether, during the siege of Sebastopol, the demand was not always for Guardsmen to work in the trenches, because they were men accustomed to the spade and the pick, and the trench-work was done better and quicker by men drawn from agricultural districts than by men of other regiments. But the brigade depôts had not penetrated in the least into the rural districts, and the Army got scarcely any rustic recruits whatever. The sergeants carried on their operations in the back streets and alleys of large towns, and it was in the public-houses and beer-shops that recruits were found. The area for recruiting should be enlarged and carried into our country villages and parishes, and the recruiting agents should be the squire, the clergyman, the village schoolmaster, and even the farmers. These people had been of no service hitherto, because the class from which recruits were drawn did not come within their influence; but if young boys were taken their influence would be felt, and a class of men would be drawn into the Army who had never looked upon a soldier's life as a profession in which they might engage. It would be in the recollection of hon. Members that many fruitless efforts had been made to secure for soldiers who had served their time suitable employment in civil life. These efforts had failed, with some exceptions, not because the Departments were unwilling to take soldiers, but because the soldiers were unfit for the duties. Without counting the Post Office, the Telegraph Department, and the other Government offices, employing innumerable clerks and porters, there were thousands of openings on our railways, and under the large employers of labour all over the country where men, even without education, if they had steady characters and habits of obedience such as were acquired in the Army, would find ready employment at high wages. No Government patronage would be needed; natural interest would point out these men as the most proper to be engaged. This certainly was in the minds of those who advocated short service; but it was also an important part of their calculation that a superior class of men would, under short service, come into the Army. This expectation had been disappointed, and instead of getting a better class of men they were getting an inferior class. The short service had failed, not because it was a bad system in itself, but because the first link in the chain by which it was held together was weak. Let this link be strengthened, or, in other words, let measures be taken to obtain a better sort of recruit, and the difficulties which stood in the way would disappear.

GENERAL SHUTE said, he thought the House was much indebted to his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) for his very interesting and able speech, and for affording an opportunity of entering further into the question of recruiting for the Army. The Army had become a matter of great importance to the country, and he could tell the members of the Peace Society that England's strength meant European peace. The large and wealthy constituencies of this country always took a great interest in our national defences, and that interest, he believed, had been considerably increased by the late unfounded rumours. They felt that their great insurance was in the Army and Navy. They felt that England was not fully assured except her Navy was equal to compete with the combined Navies of any two Great Powers, and except her Army, though not necessarily strong, was thoroughly efficient and capable of expansion. Our constituencies placed no great faith in post-prandial military speeches, or in many of the Army Returns, and they were not far wrong. It had been assumed on three or four occasions in this debate that the recruits who joined the Army were at least 18 years of age; but all officers who had command of regiments knew that a vast proportion of the recruits were 16 and 17, and some 15, years of age. He knew a lad of 15 years and 9 months who represented when he enlisted that he was 19, and he was now put down as being 22 years of age. He was the son of a gamekeeper in the employ of an acquaintance of his who had a property near the Hog's Back, about six miles from Aldershot, and this was only one of hundreds of instances. That would give the House some idea how fallacious the Returns were. No one knew better than he did how completely young men broke down in service. Of the many hundreds of fresh-looking boys he saw land at Balaklava, he saw a vast proportion brought back from the front on the Cavalry horses to re-embark, being found utterly useless. He was aware that commanding officers were opposed to short service, because they knew that extreme youth was incompatible with it. He felt quite certain that the proper principle was to have a considerable number of weak battalions provided they were thoroughly efficient and capable of expansion, but he feared that the battalions of this country were neither efficient nor capable of expansion. We found in Bulgaria and in the Crimea that our Infantry could not carry their packs with the same facility as foreign troops from want of practice, and that as to their chacos they simply threw them all away, which proved how necessary it was for troops during peace to be constantly in their fighting dress. So immediately after the war there was an order—and a very good one it was—that at Regimental Brigade and Divisional field days the men should be in complete marching order; but he was sorry to say it had become disused, because, as he believed, many of the boys could not properly carry their accoutrements. Hon. Members might say that the officers grumbled but did not suggest remedies, but he would make one or two suggestions. First of all, he would say, and the sooner the country knew it the better, if they were to have better recruits—men and not boys—it was a question of person or purse. They must either have some form of conscription for the home Army—the Militia, with volunteers for the foreign and colonial Army, or they must pay more largely, not for unformed soldiers, but for skilled labour. The youth of England, full of courage and love of adventure, would choose the military profession and continue in it if there was anything to look forward to. They would begin with little or no pay if they felt that by zeal and intelligence they might hope to rise, gain social position, and higher emoluments. He would not increase the pay of the recruit; but he would give him what they had promised—namely, free ration, vegetables, and groceries, so as to avoid all those stoppages which were now the great cause of discontent. But that was a serious item and would cost £350,000 a-year. Then, there should be more light in the barrack rooms, so that the men might be able to read and write. They should also have more fuel, so that there might be good ventilation and warmth combined. As a recruit became a formed soldier his pay should be gradually increased, and that additional pay should be reserved pay, put in his name in the savings bank, and he should get it with interest when his service was completed. That would, to a large extent, tend to check desertion. Nothing less than 1s. a day should be given to every man who had served the Queen when he attained the age of 60, having a title to that pension one year earlier for every year he had served—that if he had served five years he would get it at the age of 55, if seven years at the age of 53, and so in proportion to the term of service. In that way they would have no old soldiers in town or village sent to the poor house, which did a great deal to discourage recruiting. He would give every soldier going on furlough a return warrant, and he should have his full pay while on furlough. At present the soldier on furlough often arrived among his friends in the condition of a pauper; and when the time for his return came having no money to pay his railway fare he absented himself and often deserted. They were much indebted to Captain Edward Walter for his suggestion that service in the Army should be made the stepping-stone to all minor civil appointments. He hoped that suggestion would be carried out, and that the gate-keepers of our public Parks and the messengers of our public offices, like the Horse Guards and War Office, should not be the superannuated servants of private individuals, but those who had done public service to the State. Prussia had in this set us a good example, the Emperor having no servants about him who were not wearing military decorations. He had spoken of conscription for the Home Army, the Militia. At present we had virtually conscription, but in the form of a most clumsy ballot. The Acts of 22 & 23 Vict. ought to be altered. The present system of exemption gave an unfair advantage to those who should bear the largest share of the burden. Those who had most to protect should contribute most towards its defence. There should be no payment for substitutes, but there should be a sort of income tax exemption descending to a very low scale. For example, a man worth £20 a-year would pay £1 for exemption; if worth £40, he would pay £2; if worth £100, he would pay £5, and so on. With regard to desertion, he thought the magistrates of the country should be able to take cognizance of desertion as well as the military Courts. A great deal of harm was, he felt satisfied, done by having men marched through the country under military escort. On the question of localization, he wished to observe that, in his opinion, our brigade depôts should be established at strategical points—that was to say, as near as possible in each county to the great railway junctions. As to recruiting, he had no faith in the success of brigade depôts, for his experience was that men did not generally enlist in their own neighbourhood, where, perhaps, they happened to have got into some scrape—generally about a woman. One of the best troop sergeant-majors he ever had was a man who had enlisted because it was alleged that he had been too attentive to the clergyman's wife. Such men were not likely to enlist in their own counties. The pomp and circumstance of war were its great attractions to most young men, and they were more likely to enlist by hearing good bands play and seeing dashing field-days than by merely looking on upon men going through the "goose step" at the brigade depôts. The whole question resolved itself into this—would the country increase the military expenditure or have conscription, or have neither? He was very much afraid that the country would do neither; and, if so, our Army must continue to consist of the rubbish of which it was composed now. Reference had been made to the difficulty of mounting Horse Artillery and Cavalry. He believed that in case of war a sufficient supply of horses could be obtained. Every Cavalry regiment ought to have double the number of men that it had horses. What were called the advance Cavalry regiments mounted about 330 horses, whilst the least advanced mounted 260 or 270. And, in his opinion, they ought not to be used under four years of age. If these remarks, which were of a practical nature, were productive of any good results he should feel perfectly satisfied, and very grateful for the attention which had been paid to them.

MR. M. T. BASS said, he thought it had been clearly demonstrated that our recruiting system was very defective, and that we ought to have a thorough reform in that respect, and also that the present condition of our Army was most unsatisfactory. He hoped he should not startle the House if he ventured to suggest that they could not get a perfect remedy for this state of things without having recourse to conscription in one form or another. It had been suggested by the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton (General Shute) that there might be a sort of income tax, contributed by those who were liable for conscription, so as to form a fund which might be distributed advantageously amongst those who would volunteer for such service as might be required of them. He found that the number of men who every year attained the age of 20 in England and Wales was 220,000, the number in Ireland and Scotland being probably 60,000 or 80,000, or in all about 300,000. Now, he saw no reason why they should not be liable to the ballot or conscription of some kind. He was old enough to recollect the employment of the ballot, and he was sure it did not create that degree of alarm and distrust which the mention of it now seemed to excite. Everybody was ready at the time to which he referred to take his turn of service, and he had the honour of serving himself. But to return to the suggestion which he had risen to make, he saw no good reason why each of the 300,000 young men who every year reached the recruiting age should not be made liable to pay, say, his first week's income, and 30,000 eligible recruits, which was all that was annually required, be secured by the due distribution of the money thus obtained.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, he agreed with what the noble Lord had said about the immature age of recruits; but he could not agree with him in the sweeping condemnation of our Army system generally. Among the statements of the noble Lord to which he took exception was, where he said that we had now 10,000 less Infantry than in 1853. [Lord ELCHO: On the Home establishment.] Now, what were the facts? At the time the Crimean War broke out, between March and September, we were able, with great difficulty, to put into the field 27,160 men. In the following year re-inforcements amounting to 16,800 were sent out, and in the second year the number sent out was 16,000, and they were afterwards re-inforced by 6,000 more, making in two and a-half years a body of some 66,000 Infantry put into the field.

LORD ELCHO said, that what he had stated was that, according to the Estimates for 1853 and 1875, we had 10,000 men fewer in the latter than we had in the former year. We had 74,000 in 1853, and the number in 1875 was 64,000.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK: The noble Lord's statement substantially is that we are 10,000 men weaker now than we were at the time of the Crimean War.

LORD ELCHO: According to the Blue Book.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, that the Crimean War broke out in March, and that between March and September a force of 27,000 was put in the field; but in two years and a-half the strength of the Army in the Crimea was so re-inforced as to be brought up to 66,000 men. The men obtained in 1853, however, were only got by discounting the future, and by draining every available regiment in India, the Colonies, and at home. The noble Lord, moreover, judged of the existing system at a time when it had not been fully developed, for not a man had yet passed from the Army into the Reserve. These drafts of men did not begin till next year, and the system would not be in full force until seven years from the present time. At present we had an effective Force at home of 5,000 Guards, 37,390 Infantry, 7,800 men in the depôts—making together, after allowing a deduction of 20 to 25 per cent, 45,000 effective Infantry, and at the back there was a reserve of 6,300 men. Adding the Militia Reserve, with deductions on the same scale, it would be found that we had a grand total of over 74,500 effective Infantry in this country. What did that mean? Why, it meant that if we proposed to put an expeditionary force into the field to-morrow, we could command 50 battalions of 1,000 rank and file each, leaving at the back of that force 23 battalions to fill up the war strength of those that might suffer losses. That was a large Army for this country; but it by no means exhausted our effective strength. In addition to all he had stated we had 22,000 pensioners who had served in one or two campaigns, and who could not be excelled for home and garrison work. But even these considerable numbers did not exhaust our supply. The men who were derived from the 10 years system ought also to be taken into consideration. Between the years 1865 and 1873 there were discharged no fewer than 40,600 men who had served 10 years in the Army, 10,400 men who had served a shorter term, and 26,950 men who had purchased their discharge, making a total of more than 71,900 effective soldiers who during the last 10 years had been passed into the civil population. Even supposing that a very large proportion of these had emigrated, and making all allowance for deaths and casualties, we ought to be able from this source alone to get 20,000 effective soldiers. Briefly, the short-service system might be summed up as embracing short service, localization of the forces, and closer alliance between the Militia and the Line. For himself he thought that the short-service system had vindicated itself. It had not yet properly come into operation, but it had already given us an effective Reserve of 36,000 men. By the end of 1879 we should get some 19,000 more soldiers added to the Reserve, and three years after that, by which time the system would have reached its full development, no fewer than 41,000 men would have passed through the Regular Army into the Reserve. The noble Lord and hon. Members opposite had depreciated everything that had been done, but had not offered any effective remedy. In addition to the advantages of the short service system, a complete localization of our forces had been going on by means of the brigade depôts. They had been in existence only two years, yet out of 20,000 men who had enlisted, 15,000 had been raised in the brigade depôts. That was a satisfactory result, and if the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War would only develop the system by the means in his power, the results would be all that could be desired. In the Militia, we had the most valuable resource this country could possibly possess, and he differed totally from those who desired to do away with it. If the Militia was properly encouraged, its peculiarities—for it had many—studied, and its weak points strengthened, a very small expenditure of money would give us all we wanted. If the right hon. Gentleman availed himself of the machinery at his disposal and improved its defects, he believed that a smaller sum than £400,000 additional would give us every man this country could want under any circumstances. So far from being a failure the voluntary system had, in his opinion, been a great success. In four years, between the Militia and the Line, the voluntary system had produced, on an average, 48,000 men a-year, and that could hardly be said to have been a failure. There were, however, one or two defects which the noble Lord had pointed out, but which, if traced to their source, would be found to be the remains of the old long service system. The noble Lord had shown that we were in the habit of taking recruits whose age was uncertain, and he would like to have no men counted effective who were not 20 years of age. But if we had every year 20,000 men returned as over 20 years of age, what greater security as to the fact should we have than we had at present? The class from whom we drew our recruits were not in the habit of referring to their baptismal certificates. At present some 10 per cent of the men enlisted in our Infantry would never make efficient soldiers, and it would take two or three years to make an equal number efficient. The simple remedy was not to take men of an inferior stamp, and, instead of looking to returns, we should leave the whole matter to the medical officers. As to the localization of our forces, whereas in 1870 we had no system whatever, we had now throughout the country 68 or 69 various centres, forming a framework which, in time of war, he had no doubt would yield us most satisfactory results. But that was a mere question of organization and brains, and, without going to either of the extremes of forced service or a largely increased expenditure of money, a medium could be found in increased payment of the Reserve and greater attention to recruiting.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, I have listened with great attention to this debate from the beginning, and I must remark that I think I have some reason—I will not say to complain—but, rather, to be surprised at the course of it. My noble Friend (Lord Elcho) put upon the Paper a Motion which in its character was of a very limited kind; it was that there should be two lists put upon the Estimates, one of those under 20 years of age, and one of those above. How that was to be carried into effect my noble Friend did not exactly explain, because, as the Estimates are for future services and not for past, it would be difficult to put upon them the men we were going to get according to their ages. It would be impossible to do it. But what my noble Friend seems to require is really done, because he is able at any time to ascertain from the Returns the condition of the Army from year to year. It might be supposed from what my noble Friend said, that there was some hidden law in this which was not anywhere to be discovered. But the facts are given here, and can be ascertained by those who take the trouble. The fact is of late years the number of recruits from 18 to 20 years of age has been gradually diminishing. In 1874 the number of men from 18 to 20 years of age—including the Indian Army—was 19,764; 20 to 25, 59,019; 25 to 30, 38,812; 30 to 35, 31,818. When we get beyond that point I dare say my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) will say we have no serviceable soldiers, but I will give the figures to the end. The number of men between 35 and 40, is 22,548; and from 40 to 50, 5,013. There are, therefore, altogether 176,974, men of whom the portion between 18 and 20 years of age only amounts to 19,764. And yet I am told the Army is in a most deplorable condition—that I am floundering in deep water, and I have my Friends from all quarters of the House assuring me that they are offering me all the help in their power to enable me to reach dry land. They will not allow me to swim by myself or choose my own landing place after I have taken pains to obtain information on these different subjects which I have heard mentioned with great pleasure, because they will in that way be impressed upon me. But I will venture to say that there is not one of these subjects which has not been considered by me during the time I have had the honour to be at the War Office, and I would ask my hon. Friends who are trying to pick me out of the water to leave me some chance of arriving at the shore by myself, lest they should drown me in their efforts to save me. My noble Friend (Lord Elcho) has used his Motion as a peg on which to hang a long speech on the Army generally. He began by speaking of the great extent of the subject he had before him, and therefore he could not have referred merely to this smaller portion of the Army which is younger than many persons would desire; but, at the same time, there are many eminent military and medical authorities who think it extremely desirable that you should catch your recruit at an age as early as 18, as by the time he reaches 20 he is much better fitted for service than a man who is first drawn at that age from the same class, and who has not been so well-fed or so well-cared for. When my noble Friend tells us that you cannot get a good soldier until he has at least had a year's training, surely a recruit, who, at 19, has been a year under your training may be put as a soldier upon the Estimates, even although he has not arrived at this mystical age of 20. But is it an undesirable or new thing to obtain recruits between 18 and 20? Is there any period in history, I would ask, at which recruits were not taken at this age? Many of those who have fought in some of the greatest battles fought by the English nation have been men between 18 and 20, and it is quite clear that it should be so from what happened in the Crimea, and from what must happen when you have such an Army as you had then. My noble Friend said he would prefer old soldiers instead of new men. [Lord Elcho: I quoted His Royal Highness.] Yes; but my noble Friend quoted it with some exultation as a sentiment in which he concurred, and it was accepted with cheers by the House. What occurred? You had your grand Army. I admit that nothing could be finer in its character or its fitness for the work it had to do; but when it began to be diminished by disease and wounds, and calamities which fell upon it, what followed? You had then to go into those very markets which you complain of now, and to get recruits who, without home preparation, had to be sent at once into the field where, as the General commanding then said, they "died away like flies." Do you wish to repeat that? If you will not have men under training for a certain number of years, you must altogether alter the conditions of your present system, and you must find out some new method of obtaining reserves to supply the inevitable deficiencies which occur in Armies in the field. No proposition, as I understand, has been made for supplying those reserves. I quite admit—I feel it most deeply—that the great object we should have in view when we have these comparatively young men who are not in a condition perhaps during the first year or two to undergo all the fatigues of a long campaign, is to find means of filling up these cadres to a position in which they could go into service. My noble Friend quoted a statement of His Royal Highness the Field Marshal Commanding in Chief that he was ready to go anywhere at five minutes' notice with the Army he found at Aldershot, just as it was. I having looked at what the illustrious Duke really said do not read it at all in that way. What he said was that he was ready to take every man of the force. That did not mean that he would go merely with a force which did not pretend to be on a war footing, and which only represented the cadres of regiments, while the Cavalry was on its lowest footing, being the last for service. But the illustrious Duke said, with respect to the men whom he saw there, and examined with his general officers most carefully, that combining them with others, and putting them on a war footing, he would be ready to take them into action anywhere at any time. So long as you attempt to have short service you must provide reserves to fill them up. I have made no secret of my opinion upon that or any other point with respect to the Army; but I object most strongly to suggestions as to the deplorable condition of our Army, which are not founded upon facts. We have heard the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms), as I think, with some want of judgment, saying of the Army of India, as to which we have had no official complaints, that it is not fit for the service in which it is engaged, and comparing it, to its detriment, with the Armies of Scindia and other Indian Princes. I say he is doing dishonour to the British arms. Now, I should not like to follow my noble Friend further in the words of the illustrious Duke to which he referred, which he had got, I know not where, from the "man in the street." Those statements are not to be found in any printed form; and I think it is a little hard upon the illustrious Duke to repeat statements of that kind when he is not present, and has no opportunity of making any explanation. So far as I am concerned I cannot notice them. [Lord ELCHO: I referred to a published report.] But my noble Friend referred to other statements said to have been made by the illustrious Duke, and as I have no record of them, and do not know what were the exact words, it would not be right for me to make any comment on them. When my noble Friend spoke of the state of the Infantry he omitted all mention of the Guards; and although I will put them no higher than 5,000 men that would make a very considerable difference. With respect to the question of age, does the noble Lord propose that men under 20 are to receive a lower rate of pay than those above that age? [Lord ELCHO: Yes.] Well, it would certainly be a very extraordinary thing to have men serving in the same ranks, doing the same duty, and receiving different rates of pay. The hon. and gallant General opposite (Sir George Balfour) has stated that there were many suggestions of the Royal Commission on recruiting which have not been carried into effect. Now, I find that a great number of their suggestions have been carried into effect; but I certainly do not find among them one that the Secretary of State should take up the recruiting himself. The Commission recommended that there should be an Inspector General of Recruiting and that recommendation has been carried out. The hon. and gallant General opposite said that we were not prepared to send our recruits to Germany, and he also said, to my great astonishment, that it was very probable that we should have had to send an Army to Germany in 1870. The right hon. Gentleman who was at the head of the late Government will doubtless be much surprised at the statement of the hon. and gallant General, and I am certain that the people of this country never awoke to the fact which the hon. and gallant General now announces for the first time. But it has been said to-night that we shall never be able to send an Army to the assistance of our allies of the Continent in case of emergency. Now, I am not prepared to admit the accuracy of that statement, although, of course, its truth would depend upon the number of troops we were expected to send. The hon. Member for Hackney tells us that we do not pay any attention to our military organization; but I can assure him that he is mistaken on that point, because the organization of our Army occupies a very large portion of our attention, so that provision should be made, so far as is possible, for such duties as it may be called on to perform. Again, it is an ingenious aspersion upon the War Department, as well as derogatory to this great country, to suggest that we do not contemplate a possibility of our being called upon, under certain circumstances, to assist our allies in case of need. I am quite satisfied that if I were not to take that possibility—I hope not probability—into consideration, I should be greatly neglecting the duty I have to discharge. I am, of course, aware that in making that statement hon. Members may differ from me as to the size of the Armies that we might have to send to the assistance of our allies; but on that point I must take my own view as to the number of troops that may be necessary for home defences, as well as of the number we may have to send abroad. Hon. Members have not to-night told us with sufficient clearness in what our military deficiency consists. I am aware that a small portion of our recruits may deceive us as to their age when they enlist, and certainly the hon. and gallant Member behind me (General Shute) gave us a most extraordinary instance of a boy of 15 years and 9 months enlisting. The singular part of the affair, however, is that that boy is now, at the age of 22, a sergeant, having obtained rapid promotion in consequence of his efficiency; and the probability is that had he waited until he was 20 before he enlisted he would not have attained the high rank in the service which he now holds.

COLONEL NORTH said, that if the young man in question had gone into the field he would probably have broken down.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I quite admit that the hon. and gallant Member has guarded himself both as regards his horses and his men; but the argument remains the same notwithstanding. Turning to the arguments of the hon. Member for Hackney, as I gather them both from his speeches and his writings, he appears to take a totally different view of our military situation from any other hon. Member in this House. I do not know any hon. Member except the hon. Member for Hackney who advocates the separation of our Army into three portions—a Colonial Army, an Indian Army, and a Home Army.

MR. J. HOLMS explained that his proposition was that the Army should be one, but divided into two classes as regarded enlistment in time of peace—that for home service and that for foreign service.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I think that the hon. Member in his writings proposes to make a difference between the Indian and the Colonial Army; but I will take it that he proposes that our Army should be divided into two, a Home and a Foreign Army, and that he further proposes that the Home Army should be abolished and should be supplanted by the Militia.

MR. J. HOLMS said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would not misunderstand his proposition. It was that there should be an enlistment for seven years for India and the Colonies which should be continuous, and that there should be a similar enlistment for seven years for home defence, which should be broken or suspended at the end of three years, the men being liable for service, if necessary, until the end of their term.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: I think I understand the hon. Member to propose that the Home Army shall not serve abroad except in case of emergency—that is to say, to place them in the same position as the Militia are at present, who are not called upon to serve abroad unless they are embodied and in cases of emergency. In any case there would be, at all events, a separation in the recruiting for the Home Army and for the Indian and Colonial Army. That would introduce a very considerable change in the position of our Home Army, which would no longer receive that training in active service in India which so largely conduces, under our present system, to its efficiency and its discipline. The hon. Member for Hackney says that in the Army all is wrong, and that the ages of men entering the Army are unsettled. There has been no time when men between the ages of 18 and 35 have not been taken for the Army. He says that long service is absolutely effete; but I find that long service has yet many advocates, and I should say that the contest between the hon. Member for Hackney and the friends of long service is not yet over, and I think he will have many formidable opponents to meet on this question. The hon. Member says that he is opposed to conscription in every shape and form, and that it is absolutely unnecessary. I think that is inconsistent with the statement he made about the Prussian Army, which he held up so much to admiration, and in which the Government has the power of putting its hands on 300,000 young men every year. The hon. Member says that his remedy for our military deficiency is the establishment of a short service system far shorter than that of Prussia—as short even as one year. That is all very well, but you have first to get the men who are to pass through this short service. The whole thing, in the opinion of the hon. Member, resolves itself into a question of money. The hon. Member goes from conscription to money, and says that by means of money we shall get recruits from all parts, and he puts the price to be offered at 16s. a-week. But is there a necessity for our adopting the proposal of the hon. Member? We are now suffering from the consequences of the great pressure in recruiting that was brought to bear in 1870, when 18,000 young men were suddenly thrown into the Army; and as long as the present system of sending abroad our oldest and most seasoned soldiers and of keeping our youngest men at home exists, so long will our Army appear to be composed of an undue proportion of young soldiers. Now, we are told that it is possible for us to obtain a higher class of recruits. I have made every possible inquiry as to the character of the present recruits, and I find that the oldest officers and those who are most conversant with the subject are of opinion they are, on the whole, of the same class as formerly. In the Cavalry they are better; and with reference to some of the Infantry regiments and to districts where it would hardly be expected, I have heard officers say that, both physically and intellectually, the recruits are superior to what they used to be. I was surprised to see it attributed to me that I had said that 30 per cent of the Army was unsatisfactory. What I said was that 30 per cent of the recruits, at the outside, was stated in Returns before the House not to be satisfactory. What the hon. Member for Hackney came to at last was a question of payments. Taking into account the advantages the soldier has, he estimated the pay that he received at 13s. 5d. a-week. I think it should be estimated somewhat higher. As to the advantages, it is very difficult to set a money value on them, for they are of a kind to which a working man is altogether a stranger. As to the Cavalry, I think the pay might be taken to be at a very much higher rate. Indeed, I have heard it put at 23s. a-week. But, assuming the figure given by the hon. Member for Hackney to be correct, am I to understand that he proposes we should at once add 2s. 6d. to the pay of the soldier? It seems to me this would be rather a dangerous proceeding to take where men have been satisfied to come in at the lower rate, and are coming in at present in sufficient numbers to supply the ranks. And has the hon. Gentleman calculated the cost of what he proposes with regard to the Reserves? I am not one who would shrink from submitting sufficient Estimates for the Army; but I think it would be most unwise, in a time of peace, to impose suddenly a large additional charge upon the country. The financial suggestions of the hon. Member are such, I think, as would somewhat alarm the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. J. HOLMS explained that while he desired to see a large Reserve the the Regular Army would become a training school rather than a Standing Army; and, under these conditions, the Estimates would fall very considerably.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: The hon. Member proposes that there should be a large Reserve, paid at a high rate, with the object of reducing what is called the Standing Army. I do not pretend to be so well-informed on military matters as some of my Friends; but I have always understood that very small cadres were very inefficient, especially when the reduction was beyond a certain point, because the cadres would not then afford the opportunity of the men getting sufficient training. The hon. Gentleman has really not given us a complete statement of his case. He has not stated what the great change he proposes would cost. And it would certainly be a great change. Now I cannot help calling the attention of the House to the great changes which have been going on in the Army in recent years—changes so great that I should tremble to make others which were not absolutely necessary, because of the feeling of dissatisfaction which must be expected to exist in the Army if there is a continual uncertainty as to what may happen. So dangerous do I think these frequent changes that I must be excused for moving somewhat more slowly than some of my Friends may desire. I trust, however, that credit will be given me for an anxious desire to remove any defects there may be in the existing system. No doubt there are defects. There may be a great necessity—I am inclined to admit there is a necessity—that we should expedite the means of filling up the cadres in the case of urgent need. I think that my noble Predecessor (Viscount Cardwell), though he estimated the number that would come in every year, yet he fell into error from not making sufficient allowance for reductions that will inevitably occur. When we are dealing with the Indian Army as well as with that in England, it should be borne in mind that we must occasionally of necessity detain men longer from the Reserve than they would otherwise be kept; and therefore you must not calculate on that rapidity of increase in the Reserve which superficially would appear from maintaining it upon the footing on which it now stands. When the Militia is talked of as the foundation of our recruiting system, I cannot but feel that there is great difficulty in dealing with the Militia upon that footing; because there will always be a desire to maintain a regiment of Militia that has been got together with great care and anxiety: and there may naturally be wanting an earnest and keen desire upon the part of its commanders to pass their best men into the Army. Notwithstanding all this, however, I yet believe that the best way of supplying our Army with recruits will be through the Militia. I am aware that a distinguished officer has expressed the opinion that with that object it would be a good thing to abolish the existing recruiting establishments entirely. This, however, is a subject which requires great consideration. Then as to what has been said by the hon. Member for Derby (Mr. M. T. Bass), I believe that many years ago he told me of that scheme which he had. It is very much like a system of substitutes; for you are to give the money to buy one, though you do not provide one yourself; for rich men would find themselves practically in the same position as if they were to provide substitutes. With respect to the ballot for the Militia, there is no doubt that the law is at present in an unsatisfactory state. I have this year brought in a Bill which I hope the House will allow to pass without much amendment, it being a mere Consolidation Bill of what may be called the Voluntary Militia Law, except in so far as there are some amendments proposed which have become necessary owing to the Militia having been brought under the War Office instead of being under the Lord Lieutenant. If that Bill is passed, we shall then have before us in a convenient shape the whole of the law relating to the Volunteer Militia. There are difficulties connected with the ballot, and yet it is quite obvious that whoever has to do with the management of the War Department in this country must contemplate the possibility of having to call into action the ballot system of the Militia. It remains as a sheathed sword which it may become necessary to draw. I do not think it would be wise to draw it unnecessarily; but if the necessity should arise, I am sure no Minister with a due sense of duty would shrink from availing himself of it. After the discussion we have had, I hope the House will now permit us to go into Committee on the Militia Vote; the only Vote which it is intended to propose to-night.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, that as his noble Friend who brought forward the Resolution would be unable to reply, he would simply address the House on the subject before it. He did not think that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had said anything that would dissipate the anxiety that prevailed in reference to the Army. He talked in a disparaging way of the mystical age at which recruits were got; but the right hon. Gentlemen and his Friends ought to have spoken out in 1871 upon the Army Regulation Bill, when he (Mr. Torrens) brought forward a clause to prohibit the sending of men under 20 in the Army out of the country. On an average of 10 years they had had invalided home from India 5,000 men; and of these two-thirds were under 25, and many were under 20 years of age. Of these 5,000 men, 70 per cent had pulmonary and heart complaints, and great numbers of them were sent to perish in workhouses. The authorities were sending young men to India every year by thousands who were not fit to serve, and the result was they had to bring them home soon in an exhausted state. That was a practice which was as cruel to the raw lads they enlisted, and as burdensome to the finances of India, as it was injurious to the efficiency of the Army and dangerous to the interests of the Empire; and until it was abandoned our military system could never be brought into a satisfactory state. He believed any medical man of experience, who was free to give an opinion without directions from head-quarters, was capable of giving an opinion as to whether a youth was 16, 17, 18, or 20 years of age.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, there was a difficulty in ascertaining the age from the statements made to the medical men.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, he did not agree as to the impracticability of discovering it. When his noble Friend (Lord Elcho) said that no man in the Oxford and Cambridge Boat Race was allowed to row in the race unless he was over 20 years of age, he was caught up by an hon. Member behind him. But he (Mr. Torrens) could state to the House that Professor Skey, who had great hospital practice, used to warn his private patients against allowing their sons who were at College to join the boats crews, because he believed that the great exertion which they would undergo would tend to produce serious consequences, probably disease of the heart. With regard to the class of men which it was desirable to obtain for the Army, if they wanted serviceable men they could have them by paying for them; and if they did not pay for them they did not deserve to have them. With regard to boys in the Navy and boys in the Army, the case was very different. He had a conversation the other day with an experienced authority on the subject, who pointed out to him the difference of the duties and position of boys in those respective services, that of the Navy being the most healthful. He (Mr. Torrens) had heard somewhere that Members of Parliament ought not to criticize what were called Returns in reference to the Army and Navy, and that they deserved to be lectured for meddling in those matters. But let him ask what the business of the House of Commons was? The business of Members of Parliament, whether they were mercantile men or representatives of agricultural interests, was to inquire into those matters; and he hoped he should always be free to make suggestions on the subject, and that he should not be told that it was presumption in Members of Parliament in their places in this House to say that the Army was not in an efficient condition. Members of Parliament were not to be lectured in that way; and let it be borne in mind that Parliament was supreme, and that the House of Commons had a perfect right to express its opinion on a branch of the Service which cost the country £15,000,000 a-year. The country wanted men, and not imitations, and they were labouring under the conviction that the latter was all they got at an expenditure of £3,000,000 annually.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, this was a very curious debate, being, until the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had spoken, all one-sided. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had in his speech built up "a house of cards" that he might knock it down, and told them that they had had a most satisfactory discussion. There could be no doubt that practically all except the right hon. Gentleman had agreed upon the point that the country did not get a marketable article for the money spent. With regard to the question of the term of service, very great difference of opinion existed; but with respect to the so-called mystical age of 20, there was no difference of opinion. It was well established by military experience as the age under which the soldier could not be efficient. When Napoleon I. had exhausted all his young men of 20, he had to fall back on younger soldiers, and the result was patent in the calamities which befel the French arms in 1813. The truth was, the Secretary for War could not help himself in the present state of things. With respect to the pay of the soldiers, take it with all sorts of advantages, rations, barrack accommodation, &c., it did not amount to more than 14s. 1d. per week; but there were matters which brought it down to 13s. 5d. a-week. Now, 14s. 1d. a-week might be thought sufficient to induce men in the West of Ireland, whose wages were as low as 9s. a-week, to enter the Army; but many of them had better prospects from their relations, who might leave them something, and preferred remaining at home, and if they did leave their homes they expected the market rate of wages in England, in the North of which agricultural labourers got 18s. a-week, which was a greater inducement to them than the pay of a soldier in the Army; so that soldiers were receiving 4s. a-week under the market rate of wages. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Holms) had put it down at 3s.; but he (Captain Nolan) said 4s. Thus it might be deduced that soldiers were serving under the market rate of wages. It was not fair to expect men to make such sacrifices. As there would be the strongest opposition to a conscription, they never would have an Army in an efficient state until they were paid a more remunerative price.

COLONEL MURE said, the debate which had taken place that night was one of the most remarkable in reference to the Army, because no soldier or civilian, with the exception, perhaps, of the Secretary of State for War and his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sunderland (Sir Henry Havelock), had said that the Army was in a satisfactory condition. In venturing to say a few words, he would, in the first place, remark that they ought to keep faith with the population from whom they obtained their recruits. His opinion was that the difficulties which they had to contend with in obtaining recruits did not emanate so much from an unwilling population as from the discontent which radiated from the barrack square. Not very long ago a Circular was issued from the War Office, which was issued to the recruiting sergeants, and which they were ordered to read to recruits. One of the paragraphs of that Circular was to this effect—that it had been calculated that a prudent soldier could deposit at least 3s. in the savings bank per week, and consequently they would be master of a capital of £50 upon concluding their six years' service. Now, no man with a knowledge of human nature, much more a knowledge of a soldier, could believe that it was possible for a soldier, who would receive, at the outside, only about 6d. per day, to save £50 in six years. As a matter of fact, it was impossible that a soldier could save so much as 6d. a-day, when they took into account the expenses of autumn manœuvres, and the stoppages to which a soldier was subjected for various articles. If a man had all the virtues of the patriarch Joseph, and all the self-denial and practical and theoretical virtues of the hon. Member for Carlisle, and if, besides that, he never did a generous deed, never helped a friend in distress, and never spent a single farthing in any of the ordinary enjoyments of life, he might, by the barest possibility, save £45 in the course of six years. The right hon. Gentleman did not know the Army; he had been brought up to the law, and would no doubt recollect the legal maxim, De minimis non curat lex, according to which maxim the authorities were not justified in exhibiting most exceptional and rare cases as the general rule; and therefore the War Office was not justified in holding out to the recruit that he would be able to realize £50 during the years of his service. When they offered any temptation to young men to enlist, they should not put before him that which was barely possible, but that which was probable and likely. The soldier gave his time and industry, which was his capital, and invested it in the Army, and if he was tempted to enter it on the inducement that he would be able to retire at the end of six years with a saving of

£50, he was working on the representations of a false prospectus, as false as any of those issued by Companies of limited liability of which, unfortunately, they every day heard so much. Now, he asked, was it politic to hold out false hopes which dazzled to disappointment and discontent, which, radiating from the barrack square, rendered the service unpopular? Was it creditable that youths often on the verge of starvation should be induced to enlist by false representations, and that non-commissioned officers should be employed to deceive them by deliberate falsehood? He had persistently and thoroughly inquired into this matter, and he never received from quarter-master or non-commissioned officer any other answer than that the representation was absolutely and entirely false. A recruiting sergeant informed him lately that he and his colleagues knew that this representation was false, but that they had to obey their orders. He was perfectly convinced that the right hon. Gentleman, when he issued that Warrant, thought it entirely true; but he must have gone for his information to some actuary or average clerk, for if he had gone to men of experience in the Army they would have told him quite a different tale. In a late debate the right hon. Gentleman had told them of the moral condition of the Army, and to show how high it stood in public estimation stated there was a clergyman's son in one of the regiments. Well, that clergyman's son had been in the Army ever since he knew it. Twenty-five years ago, when he joined the Army, the first night he was at mess he sat beside an enthusiastic ensign—all ensigns were enthusiastic—who said to him—"This is a splendid regiment: we have got a clergyman's son in it." From that moment he conceived a very high idea of the estimation in which that regiment was held, and of the moral condition of the Army. If, instead of quoting stale stories, the right hon. Gentleman would refer to the official records of crime in the Army, he would have to adopt a different tone. Still, looking at the class from which the Army was recruited, it was wonderful their soldiers were not worse behaved than they were. Every moral agency was resorted to for their improvement, and yet during the last three years they had to send out of the Army as many as 6,000 men for bad conduct. During the last year there had been 16,000 courts-martial, and 11,000 separate men had been brought to trial before them. Besides, there had been 235,000 punishments inflicted by the commanding officer, so that it would appear as if the whole Army had been punished once, and 60,000 of it punished twice in the course of last year. There had been, besides, 47,000 fines inflicted for drunkenness. That being the case, he did not wonder that the better class of men did not enlist. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would reply that the Army was no worse now, morally, than it was many years ago; but what did that amount to? Why, merely to this—that the Army was as morally bad then as it was now. Now, looking at the vast improvement which had of late years taken place in all phases of life and in every social sphere, would that answer be satisfactory? For instance, our troops committed terrible excesses in the Peninsular War, at St. Sebastian, and other places. Would we have tolerated such excesses had they been committed two years ago at Coomassie? Unfortunately, this was the only country in Europe where the uniform of a soldier was considered a badge of disgrace. Theatrical managers and steam-packet and railway companies would not allow a man wearing the Queen's livery, unless a commissioned officer, to take his place among civilians. His breast might be covered with medals—proofs of his distinguished gallantry—his uniform might show the high rank he had obtained among non-commissioned officers, and yet he was considered a Pariah in civil life with the Victoria Cross on his breast! The Secretary for War asked for suggestions. He would offer one to the right hon. Gentleman—namely, that it should be made illegal for lessees of theatres and railway and steam-boat companies to exclude any section of Her Majesty's subjects from the full privileges which they all ought equally to enjoy. He had lately been staying in a country house. A friend of his was very enthusiastic about the local gaol, and they went together to inspect it. He (Colonel Mure) had some communication with the gaoler, who was a well-informed and somewhat voluble person. He said to him—"Now, you must have studied human nature a good deal; what conclusion have you come to?" "I have," said the gaoler, "and I have come to the conclusion that all the prisoners may be divided into two classes, those who have been led into trouble, and those who are naturally bad men." "Do you not try and influence them when they leave you?" asked the hon. and gallant Gentleman. "Certainly," said the gaoler. "To those who have been led away by others I say—'Try and earn your living honestly in however humble a capacity, and don't go back to the district you came from, because they know you there and you will be blown upon.'" "And what do you say to those poor creatures who are naturally bad?" asked the hon. and gallant Gentleman. "I say, 'Go into the Army; go into the Army,'" replied the gaoler. This was the way in which the Army was estimated by the general public, and he sincerely hoped the right hon. Gentleman would endeavour to improve it in this respect. This was probably the last discussion the House would have upon the Army. He (Colonel Mure) had expressed his opinion—an opinion formed on both private and official information of the highest authority—and notwithstanding the halting defence which had been set up by the War Office, he was all the more convinced that matters were far from satisfactory. At the same time he felt certain that the late discussions had been of use, and that, far from embarrassing, they had really strengthened the hands of the War Minister. In conclusion, he begged to acknowledge the invariable courtesy which the right hon. Gentleman had displayed during the late debates, and his sincere belief in his earnestness of purpose and ability to grapple with all the difficulties of his distinguished position.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he thought his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sunderland had blown hot and cold in reference to this matter. In a speech made some time back, he said that—"He did not wish to disparage unduly the state of the Army, nor to throw a slur upon the ruby-coloured Report which had been made on the recruiting service; but those who were acquainted with the condition of soldiers in this and in other countries must be aware that the securities we were resting on were merely a delusion, full 20 per cent of our Infantry troops not being fit for service. He had asked many officers of experience whether the men they were now getting were equal to those 20 years ago, and his reply was—'Nothing like them; they could not carry their arms, accoutrements, and knapsacks on the march, and we should have to leave many of them behind.'" — [3 Hansard, cccxii. 1458-9.]

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK said, the hon. and gallant Gentleman could not have heard his speech that evening, or he would know that, in effect, he had repeated the statements just quoted from his former speech.

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, he had heard every word of the hon. and gallant Member's speech, and he could not reconcile it with the statement he had just quoted. Further on in the same speech the hon. and gallant Gentleman said that—

"They were gradually coming to an emergency which, with their present means, they would not be able to cope with; and sooner or later they must adopt some modified form, not of universal service, but of universal training." — [Ibid. 1460.]

The hon. and gallant Gentleman did not, he believed, say anything of that kind to-night. The hon. and gallant Gentleman supported his right hon. Friend, he (Colonel Barttelot) thought, in everything he had done, and showed most conclusively that the Reserves at his disposal were amply sufficient. His right hon. Friend stated that he was perfectly willing to look into them, and he also made this important remark—that there was great necessity to improve the Reserves. He (Colonel Barttelot) had, on a previous occasion, called attention to the Reserves. If they paid no attention to the Reserves, he was quite sure their service must be the greatest delusion. His right hon. Friend also went further—he stated that in case of necessity he would have no objection to adopt the ballot. That would give some satisfaction to his (Colonel Barttelot's) noble Friend who sat on the bench below him. He was quite sure his right hon. Friend would bear in mind the great responsibility he had undertaken, and that next year it would be found he had not been deficient in the performance of his duty.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

£685,300, Militia Pay.

COLONEL NAGHTEN called attention to the position of non-commissioned officers of the Militia Staff. It was true that they came in on the understanding that after 20 years' service they should receive a retiring pension of 5*d.* a-day. He thought that, under the altered circumstances of the times, they laboured under a grievance which ought to be remedied at once, and he would propose that after 10 years' service these sergeants should retire with a pension of 5*d.* a-day in addition to their former pension; after 15 years, with 8*d.*; and of 20 years, with 1*s.* He thought the colonels appointed for the last two years to the brigade depôts had something very much like sinecures, and he should like to see some of that money expended in training colleges for sons of non-commissioned officers. It had been stated that the best recruits came from the Militia; but some Militia officers did not encourage recruiting, and he would suggest that such officers should retire, and be replaced by those who would encourage recruiting. As regarded the stagnation of promotion, he knew as a fact that considerable discontent existed in the Marines at the way in which the officers were treated. He believed that if Captains in the Army were allowed to retire with brevet rank, and allowed to wear their uniforms, they would be glad to do so, and thus the chances of promotion would be increased. He recommended that officers joining the Militia from the Regular service should be allowed to reckon their Army service for honorary rank in the same way that Militia officers counted their embodied service.

MR. HAYTER said, he wished to refer to a statement made by the Secretary for War when introducing the Army Estimates, that Militia officers were becoming much better instructed and had obtained a considerable number of certificates for military proficiency. He found on reference to the Army List of the present month that in the seven regiments of the Lancashire Militia, with 158 officers, only 24 had received any public certificate of proficiency, and

24 had served in the Army. In the five regiments of Middlesex Militia, out of 114 officers, only 33 had received certificates, and 21 had served in the Army. Of the whole of these 272 officers only 102 had received certificates, leaving 170 in 12 regiments who had received no certificates of proficiency. In some regiments no certificate had been received at all. Now, in the Volunteer regiment commanded by his noble Friend (Lord Elcho)—the London Scottish—every officer had obtained a certificate of efficiency except two sub-lieutenants; and in the regiment commanded by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Bulwer)—the Inns of Court—there was only one officer who had not received a certificate; and in the regiment which he himself commanded—the London Rifle Brigade—every officer but one had received a certificate. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War would take such steps as were necessary to secure a better attendance of officers at the schools, and enforcing the attainment of certificates before they obtained a higher grade. The next point to which he wished to call the attention of the Committee was the number of the Militia. He found that out of an establishment of 123,668 only 84,316 trained or were present at inspection, 10,069 having been absent without leave, and 2,642 with leave. In 1873, however, out of a smaller establishment of 120,546 we had 87,315 trained, and with those absent, with or without leave, we were only 17,194 short of our establishment against 25,143 in 1874. An increase of deficiency of trained men below the establishment of 8,000 in a single year seemed to him to call for some explanation. But the point to which he wished to draw the Secretary for War's attention was the desirability of filling up the Militia to their full quota, and, if possible, with men who had completed their first term of service in the Army. Such trained soldiers of the age of 24 would leaven the young soldiers in the ranks of the Militia, would form the most effective reserve, and would have the additional advantages both of a yearly training and being found when they were required for active service in the field. The right hon. Gentleman told them that a place would shortly have to be found for every man in the Reserve, and he sincerely trusted that might be done through the ranks of the Militia. Another point to which he wished to draw the attention of the House was the entire exclusion of the Militia, and, indeed, of all the Auxiliary Forces, from the best part of the Autumn Manœuvres this year. He saw yesterday in The Times the details of 20,000 troops who were to be engaged in these manœuvres in the neighbourhood of Aldershot during the month of July; but among them was not to be found a single Militia or Volunteer battalion. Now, having twice commanded battalions of the Auxiliary Forces at the Autumn Manœuvres, he ventured to say that there was nothing which so much roused the men to show to their best, whether in camp, on the march, or in the field. The Militia especially might complain that the arrangements of the right hon. Gentleman were so made as entirely to exclude them from their accustomed manœuvres. The last point he wished to advert to was the position of the new brigade dépôt adjutants. They were to be appointed for five years from a regiment of the Line; but if there were two battalions of Militia at the same brigade dépôt, a temporary adjutant must be appointed if they were out for training together. Would the commanding officers be as well off with one adjutant, who was really the Brigadier's adjutant, as they were with the former adjutants of their own battalions; and would the captain from the Line be equally active in looking for recruits, and in training the staff-sergeants of regiments, to whom, after all, he was only temporarily attached? They had also seen an extract from a Warrant, issued on the 29th of March, by which in certain cases the adjutant retiring under the new scheme might be promoted and appointed the major in the same regiment over the heads of all the captains, who, under his retirement, had held higher rank than himself. He trusted, in fairness to the captains, that such promotions would be very exceptional.

COLONEL GILPIN, in reply to the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Hayter), said, that upon no occasion had any officer in his regiment of Militia been examined by the Board of Officers and had not passed. With regard to the Warrant which had been recently issued in reference to the adjutants of Militia, he thought it unwise, because it was offering a bribe to them to retire from the service in the prime of life, when they were perfectly able to continue their services. It should be remembered that an adjutant of Militia was one of the most important officers in the regiment, and that so long as he could serve and was thoroughly efficient he ought to be allowed to continue to do his work. He was afraid his right hon. Friend had been hampered by adopting the plan of his Predecessor, and he would not improve that system by engrafting upon it what he now proposed to do. His system would be found to be costly, and he feared it would be unwise.

SIR HENRY HAVELOCK urged upon the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman the importance of encouraging men to pass from the Army into the Reserve. He advocated the improvement of the Militia Reserve; suggested that the period of training should be extended from 28 to 42 days, and that the sum paid should be increased from £1 to £1 10s. A large class of men in this country would willingly go into the Militia, as the service extended over a short period of the year and was entirely local, and if proper means were taken a large number of these men would go into the Line.

COLONEL BARTELOT pointed out that the number of men absent from the annual Militia trainings in different parts of the country varied considerably, and suggested that this showed the existence of defects in the mode of recruiting, which called for the attention of the Secretary of State for War. He also objected to officers of Militia being put in as lieutenants of the Line, on the ground that the sub-lieutenant who might eventually go over his head had to serve under him sometimes for a period of a year and a-half. That state of things could not be for the benefit of the Militia or the discipline of the Army.

MR. STANLEY said, that a scheme had been drawn up for meeting the grievances of adjutants, under which those who were unwilling to accept the new terms of service had the alternative of retiring on a special allowance. The calculated cost of the scheme was £18,000 a-year, but by bringing in half-pay officers to fill the vacancies, created in the Line regiments, no less than £14,000 was made available for meeting that expenditure. As to the proficiency of officers, a subject he had not expected to be introduced, he would only remark that it was not fair to infer from the fact of an officer not having his certificate that he was not sufficiently acquainted with his duties. To compel officers to attend the schools at which these certificates were given might be driving the willing horse at too great a speed; and if it did not appear that the service suffered, it was better to leave the matter for private arrangement between the officers and their commanders. It must be remembered that all examinations for promotion were now far more strict than they used to be. It was intended, as far as possible, to absorb the old quartermasters of Militia who were reported to be competent, appointing them as quartermasters of brigade depôts. With regard to the appointment of adjutants as majors, that was a matter which must be left to the discretion of commanding officers with the approval of the Secretary of State and the military authorities. With respect to absentees from Militia regiments, they were more numerous than was desirable in large towns, because there the recruits were often engaged in the autumn and winter, and it was practically impossible to be certain that they would not change their residence.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR drew attention to the fact of the great number of absentees that there were from the Militia. The last Return for 1874 laid this year before the House showed no less than 1,000 officers were reported as being absent from training, or rather absent on the day of inspection. Considering that there were only 3,486 Volunteer officers in the Force, exclusive of the permanent Staff, it must be allowed that this was an excessive number to be absentees. No doubt there were 565 of them wanting to complete, the remaining number, 413, being absent with and without leave. Out of the permanent staff of non-commissioned officers, of 4,806 sergeants and drummers there were 285 absent with leave, without leave, and wanting to complete. Again out of 7,600 sergeants and corporals appointed from the Volunteers, no fewer than 1,563 were absent on the day of inspection; and out of an establishment of 123,668 privates, only 84,316 were present on the day of inspection, making a difference of 39,352 privates, or as nearly as possible one-third of the Force. The vast extent of absentees amongst officers, non-commissioned officers, and drummers was a matter which he thought deserved the attention of the Government. This state of the Militia was one that had existed during the whole period of nearly 20 years, for which Returns had been laid before the House of Commons. Year by year these Returns showed nearly one-third of the whole Force absent on the day of inspection, not of privates alone but of all Volunteers, including officers: no doubt the permanent staff of non-commissioned officers and drummers was far more complete, but there ought not to be a man of the permanent Staff absent, seeing that they were on pay all the year. The great defect in these Returns was the absence of information as to the ranks of officers present and absent. The Return only showed officers, without dividing them into their several grades. There were also discrepancies between the numbers in the annual training Return, and the numbers entered in the Army Estimates; the grades also showed considerable differences, as also the number of privates. There was an important point connected with the Militia, and that was its military instruction. It was most essential to extend this training. He understood that many Militiamen in London and the large towns could without inconvenience attend drill in the course of the winter months; and individual training of this kind would be likely to have a most important effect. More frequent inspection to separate portions of the Militia, particularly of the Volunteer Reserve for the Army would also be of great advantage. He hoped that in the Army Estimates information would be inserted in future showing what was the establishment by ranks of the Militia regiments; the number of regiments and companies.

Mr. RITCHIE said, that since 1871 an officer promoted from the rank of a subaltern to the command of a company had to undergo a very strict examination, and no subaltern could remain in a regiment unless he passed an examination of efficiency by the end of his second training, so that it was quite a mistake to suppose that only those Militia officers were efficient who had P.S.

after their name in the Army List. With regard to the training at Aldershot, it was, while it lasted, very severe, and not suitable for Militia who could be much better trained in their county towns. This was now being carried out to a great extent, and would, he had no doubt, bear fruit in a large increase in recruiting for the Militia. The condition of the Militia was now very much improved. Their uniforms some time ago were disgraceful—the colours of their coats being various, from the dirtiest of brickdust to the brightest of scarlets. All that, however, was now changed, and the Militia were smartly and well clad, and they were no longer laughed at. Of his own regiment—the 2nd Royal Surrey—he was proud to speak in the highest terms.

LORD ELCHO said, he had a few days ago been present at an inspection of the Militia Reserve, and he was highly pleased with their discipline and excellent state of training.

PUBLIC BUSINESS—MORNING SITTINGS—MONASTIC AND CONVEN- TUAL INSTITUTIONS BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will consent to the appointment of a Morning Sitting for the consideration of the Second Reading of the Monastic and Conventual Institutions Bill? The reason why the Order for the Second Reading had been so long deferred was because of the delay in making certain Returns which had been ordered by the House on the subject.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I am sure there is no Member of the House that it would give me greater pleasure to convenience in the arrangement of Business than my hon. Friend; but my hon. Friend is under a mistake in supposing that I have any control over Morning Sittings. They must be fixed by the House. I appeal to the House whether the state of Public Business justifies me in so doing, and the House has generally supported me; and I fear I shall have on my own account to make frequent, if not constant, appeals to the House to grant Morning Sittings for the transaction of Public Business during the remainder of the Session. But, as a general rule, I never venture to ask for a Morning Sitting for the Business of the Government, unless it is in the case of a measure which the House has approved of by reading the Bill a second time. Now the case of my hon. Friend is that of a Bill which has been before Parliament for, I think, at least four years, and which the House has never read a second time. Therefore, I can hardly think that, under any circumstances, my hon. Friend can make a successful appeal to the House to grant him, at this period of the Session, the indulgence which he asks. I must repeat that it is not in my power to make that appeal, and I shall be under the necessity, in order to assist the advancement of the Government measures, to appeal to the House frequently to grant Morning Sittings for those Bills which the House has approved of by reading a second time.

PARLIAMENT — LORDS SPIRITUAL—RIGHT OF BISHOPS TO SIT IN PARLIAMENT.

OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. CHARLEY, in rising to call attention to the reduction, by the Irish Church Act, in the number of Lords Spiritual sitting and voting as Lords of Parliament, and to the provisions of Section 2 of the Act for Establishing the Bishopric of Manchester—10 & 11 Vict., c. 108—said, that this section, which introduced the principle of rotation, involving the exclusion of junior Bishops from the House of Lords, excited warm discussion at the time the Act was passed. The opposition to it was led in the House of Lords by the late Earl of Derby, who felt so strongly on the subject that he recorded in the Journals of the House his protest against the clause, which was also opposed by Earl Fitzwilliam, Lord Brougham, and the late Bishop of Winchester. In the House of Commons the opposition to the clause was led by Sir James Graham, and Mr. Stuart Wortley and other eminent Members also opposed the clause, and it only passed through the House by the support of hon. Members below the Gangway on the Liberal side, who were naturally opposed to any increase in the number of Lords Spiritual. For his part, he objected to the exclusion of junior Bishops from Parliament—first, on grounds of public policy, and secondly, on constitutional grounds. He objected to the exclusion on grounds of public policy for three reasons. He objected to it, first, because the Bishops were endowed with large powers, and it was of the last importance that they should be directly responsible for the exercise of their powers to public opinion. By placing the Bishops in the House of Lords they were put on the same footing as Ministers of State and other public men, and were liable to be questioned and called to account with reference to their actions out-of-doors; otherwise they would be practically irresponsible. In support of that proposition he might state that the late Bishop of Winchester in 1847 adduced instances in which tyrannical acts on the part of Bishops had been arrested in consequence of questions being addressed to them in their places in Parliament. He thought, therefore, that the presence of the Bishops in the Upper House was a safeguard to the liberties of the clergy, and that any agitation on the part of any section of the clergy against an increase in the number of Lords Spiritual, arising out of jealousy of Episcopal authority, was extremely short-sighted. His second reason for desiring the repeal of the 2nd section of the Act was that it excluded from the House of Lords Bishops who were in the prime of life, and who were then best able to discharge their legislative functions, while at the same time it admitted Bishops who from age and infirmity might be unable to properly discharge such functions. His third objection to the 2nd section of the Act was that it would be to the advantage of the community at large that the lay and the Spiritual Peers should be brought together in the same Assembly. Nothing could be more calculated to narrow the minds of the Bishops than to shut them up with their clergy within the limits of their own dioceses. They would thus be mere “country” Bishops, destitute of all knowledge of the motives which guide mundane actions. On constitutional grounds he objected to the 2nd section of the Act for two reasons. The first was, that it limited the Prerogative of the Crown by restraining Her Majesty, her Heirs, and Successors from summoning to the Upper House the junior Bishops until vacancies occurred in the numbers of the elder Bishops. Was it desirable to fix a precise limit beyond which the Crown was not to go with regard to the creation of Spiritual Peers? By the Irish Church Act, the number of Spiritual Peers was reduced from 30 to 26. Was the number to remain for all time at 26? He further objected to the 2nd section of the Act on constitutional grounds, because it suspended a right which the holders of our ancient Sees had enjoyed from time immemorial—the right of being summoned to the Great Council of the Nation. In 1847, Lord Russell admitted, on the part of the Government of the day, that every Bishop was entitled to be served with a Writ of Summons to Parliament, unless that right was expressly taken away by Act of Parliament. He (Mr. Charley) might be reminded of the position of the Bishop of Sodor and Man; but the position of that Bishop was only in appearance an exception, the reason of his exclusion from the Imperial Parliament being that he was a Member of the Manx Legislature. The total number of Lords Spiritual having been recently reduced from 30 to 26, Parliament could with less hesitation approach the question of increasing the number. He could not see why there should be a system of rotation with regard to the Lords Spiritual and not with regard to the Temporal Peers. Before the Reformation the number of the Lords Spiritual greatly exceeded the number of the Lords Temporal. He had every confidence in Her Majesty's Government who, no doubt, were anxious to protect the union between Church and State, but he had felt it his duty to call the attention of Parliament to the subject which involved important considerations alike of public policy and constitutional law.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that with all respect to his hon. and learned Friend, he must say that he could not see anything either in the subject or the remarks which had been made which ought to occupy their attention beyond a very short time. He (Mr. Beresford Hope) took part in the debates of 1847, to which reference had been made, and he had felt at that time that the gain to the Church in elasticity by the creation of the Bishopric of Manchester was far more than a set-off for a slight departure from the old principle that every Bishop should be a Peer of Parliament. His hon. and learned Friend had not completed his own argument, and he (Mr. Beresford Hope) would suggest that he should carry his recommendation further, and that when the new Opera House was constructed on the Thames Embankment, it should contain a Bishops' Bench. He could not sympathize with the pathetic description which his hon. and learned Friend had given of the poor country Bishop sent down to his own diocese, and deprived of the opportunity of having his mind enlarged by a residence in London. It was well known in the case of the junior Bishops how they felt that they required to be resident for two or three years in their own diocese after their appointment, in order that they might become personally acquainted with its wants, and with the clergymen with whom they had to work. If his hon. and learned Friend had taken the trouble to consult the Bishops themselves on the subject, he felt certain that he would not have raised the question, and he was sure that the course which had been taken had strengthened, not weakened, the Church in the eyes of the country. He hoped the time of the House would not be taken up in the consideration of such a subject, and trusted that they would at once proceed to other business.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON agreed very much with what had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope), and wished, at all events, that his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) had proposed some definite Resolution, instead of merely calling attention to the subject. The question was thoroughly gone into in 1847, the arguments which were now advanced had been fully considered, and what was regarded as a satisfactory settlement was then come to. As to the reduction in the number of Spiritual Peers caused by the Irish Church Act, that was a matter which ought rather to have been discussed before the Act was passed. It was never mentioned at that time, the settlement of 1847 being, no doubt, accepted as sufficient. In his opinion, Her Majesty's Government would be unwise at this time to make any alteration of the kind proposed. The arrangement to which he had referred had been found conducive to the best interests of the Church, and he did not think the alteration suggested would at all advance the cause which the hon. and learned Member for Salford had at heart.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF trusted that the hon. and learned Member for Salford (Mr. Charley) would be satisfied in knowing that his opinions were not shared by other Members of the House. He thought the measure which enabled a Bishop to get acquainted with his diocese, instead of being a bad measure had tended to increase the efficiency of the Episcopal Bench. Beyond that, there was no more reason for creating more English Bishops because of the disestablishment of the Irish Church, than there would be for creating more English Peers if the Home Rulers succeeded in obtaining a Parliament of their own at College Green.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE AND AGRICULTURE.

RESOLUTION.

Mr. SAMPSON LLOYD, in rising to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that those functions of Her Majesty's Government which especially relate to Commerce and Agriculture should be administered under the direction of a Principal Secretary of State, who shall be a member of the Cabinet, and that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that She will be graciously pleased to give effect to this Resolution," said, he desired it to be understood that, in the course of any remarks he might make on this subject, he had no intention of casting reflections on the present or preceding Governments. The Central Chamber of Agriculture, some weeks ago, passed a resolution desiring that the subject might be brought before the House in connection with the Chambers of Commerce, and it was in consequence of that resolution, and in accordance with the desire of 50 Chambers of Commerce, that he now ventured to bring the subject under their notice. He thought, however, that the commercial and agricultural interests of the country were so large that it required no apology on his part for acting as he had. When they recollected that the exports and imports, as regarded commerce, now exceeded £800,000,000 per annum, and that the tenants' capital employed in agriculture had been estimated at sums varying from £300,000,000 to £500,000,000, besides the home trade, which must amount to a very considerable sum, nothing more need be said to show that these were very great interests indeed, and deserved to be administered by a responsible Minister, a Member of the Cabinet. Formerly English industry was almost without a rival in the world. After the great French war terminated, and up to a few years ago, the circumstances of English industry were such that no competition on the part of foreign nations could possibly affect them; but now, owing to free trade and the various facilities of intercourse by sea and land, the industries of this country had to contend with foreign competition, which even went so far as to press our own producers hard in the home market. Our position as a commercial nation, then, could be maintained only on condition that the Government appreciated and, as far as possible, removed the impediments which beset our commerce on all sides, and gave it that new and legitimate help and protection which consisted not in monopoly, but in securing to British capital and enterprise a fair field abroad, and in carefully considering all matters affecting its interests at home. It was, therefore, of the greatest importance that the interests of Agriculture and Commerce should be under the charge of a properly constituted Department, and that the head of that Department should be a Minister possessing equal status and influence with the other Members of the Cabinet. What he wanted to call the attention of the House to was the fact that there was no Department in the State specially charged with the duties of watching over the interests of British Commerce and Agriculture, as affected by anything that took place in other Departments of the public service. It was a popular belief that the Board of Trade fulfilled the functions of a Minister of Commerce; but that Department had neither the requisite organization nor the requisite powers to fulfil these functions. The Board of Trade might be called in some sense a mythical body. It never met at all. At the commencement of each reign an Order in Council nominated certain high officials of State as a Committee of Council for Trade and Plantations. The Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, the First Lord of the Treasury, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and other great officers of State were placed on that body, which never met, and it was obvious that it could exercise no consultative functions. Its administrative functions, however, were performed by the President and Vice President, and they were both multifarious, numerous, and of the most varied description. Amongst them were comprised the following:—the inspection of railways, the registration of designs, the registration of joint stock companies, the relief of British subjects abroad, the granting of Royal Charters, matters relating to shipping, and the collection and distribution of deceased seamen's wages; indeed, some of its duties were inconsistent with the proper functions of a Minister of Commerce. If they turned to Agriculture, the Board of Trade did not partially, or even in pretence deal with it, and it was somewhat anomalous to find that, in another Department, the two noble Lords whose duty it was to combat the ignorance of the lower classes had also the duty devolved on them of combating the Rinderpest and Foot-and-mouth disease. There was a great want of arrangement in the various duties which devolved upon the Department, and even, however, if there were a better apportionment of the duties of the President of the Board of Trade, he was not a Member of the Cabinet, and a Minister who was not a Member of the Cabinet had not necessarily cognizance of the action taken by the other Departments; and yet that action might vitally affect commercial interests. He (Mr. Lloyd) would be amongst the first to concede that agricultural and commercial questions were not to override all others. He trusted that patriotism was as lively in the breasts of agricultural and commercial men as in that of any other class of Her Majesty's subjects. The present system needed alteration. What took place in the different Departments was not necessarily known to the Board of Trade. In 1860, for instance, Colonel Rigby made a very valuable Report on the trade of Zanzibar, and that Report was first published by another Department of the Government two years after it was received, having never been communicated to the Board of Trade at all. The Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 between Canada and the United States, although it very materially affected many important British interests, was never mentioned to the Board of Trade until it was practically concluded. The same course was adopted in the case of the first Treaty with Japan, and of the French Treaty, which was inaugurated by Richard Cobden. In fact, scarcely any question could arise in other Departments which did not have effect, direct or indirect, on trade; and the interests of Commerce and Agriculture, as he had said, could only receive due care by being represented in the Cabinet by a Minister of equal power and authority with his Colleagues. The commercial community sometimes suffered, or thought they suffered, from the want of that watchfulness over their interests which was exercised by foreign Governments on behalf of their competitors. Sir James Emerson Tennent, in his evidence before a Select Committee which sat in 1864, said that the Treasury never consulted the Board of Trade, and yet the Treasury was the Department of the State which initiated legislation on the subject of Customs, Excise, Banking, and Currency. The India Office, also, it was stated, never consulted the Board of Trade. It appeared, therefore, that when the Committee sat in 1864, taxes might have been imposed, modified, or removed, Treaties with foreign Powers concluded, Acts of Colonial Legislatures sanctioned, banking or monetary systems altered, without the previous consent of the Minister whose duty it should be to consider those changes in relation to Commerce. Nothing was further from his intention than to suggest that the functions of a Minister of Commerce should be discharged only by a man who had sprung from the ranks of commerce. What he wished to see was a Ministry of Commerce, or whatever the office might be called, filled by a trained statesman—and, happily, such men were to be found on the front benches of both sides of the House—who should be a Member of the Cabinet, and equal in point of status, experience, responsibility, and authority to those who presided over Finance, the War Office, or the Home Office. Since 1864 the former Commercial Department of the Board of Trade had, he believed, been abolished, so that the Board of Trade was now deprived of the means it then had of exercising its functions. Thus all measures of reform connected with industry and commerce were left to the initiative of the public outside, or else to that of the heads of other Departments. No doubt these heads very sincerely desired the well-being of trade and agriculture, but they did not possess in their offices those means for obtaining a knowledge of details and appreciation of consequences of their measures which would be at the hand of a Minister of Commerce with a properly organized staff. Now, that such a Minister of Commerce should be a Member of the Cabinet was recommended by the Committee who sat under the presidency of the right hon. Member for Bradford, and was also supported by Lord Russell, Lord Malmesbury, and Mr. Milner Gibson. Such a Minister was surely as much entitled to a place in the Cabinet as the custodian of Her Majesty's Privy Seal. The existing want of system was strikingly exemplified by the ignorance and uncertainty of the public as to which Department was responsible on commercial questions, deputations to the Government being referred in the most bewildering manner from one Department to another. He would give an instance of the uncertainty which prevailed on the matter. Suppose a deputation waited upon the Government to ask them to negotiate for the removal of a differential duty on British goods, which would raise the question of the propriety of reducing duties levied in this country on Portuguese wine. The Foreign Office would think there was something in what the deputation urged, and would refer them to the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and when they went to him he would refer them to the Inland Revenue or Customs, and then they would get to the Board of Trade; and, finally, if expenses were to be incurred, they would be referred to the Treasury. In Russia, Prussia, and France, Commerce and agriculture were specially represented in the Cabinet; and in India Commerce and Agriculture constituted two distinct Departments under one Chief Secretary. Having thus far dealt with the arguments in favour of his Resolution, he should, in the next place, briefly advert to the objections which were urged against it. The first of those objections was one which had been made by a Member of the late Ministry, who said that the French Treaty would never have been carried into effect, had it been necessary that its details should have been referred to a Minister of Commerce, and that the secrecy which was desirable could not have been observed if the Board of Trade had to be consulted. Now that remark might be fairly applicable to the Board of Trade as at present constituted; but it did not apply to the case of a country having a Minister of Commerce in the Cabinet, and equal in authority to the head of the Foreign Office. Another objection advanced was that agricultural and commercial communities were the best judges of their own interests, and that the Government would do more harm than good by attempting to patronize them in that way. If, however, that view were carried to its logical conclusion, it would apply with equal force against much which was already done, and also against the Government taking any part in such matters at all. Those, he might add, who were constantly engaged in commerce, were too much occupied to give that attention to the various changes in our own laws, or proceedings of foreign Governments which their importance demanded. They were not, besides, always enabled to obtain in time the requisite information; and, even if they were, they had not the power to carry their wishes into effect. The exercise of Government influence, therefore, was necessary, not to supersede the action of the mercantile community, but to give it a fair field. As matters at present stood, the interests of trade were placed at a disadvantage, not from any want of zeal on the part of those connected with it, but from the difficulty of obtaining from time to time that prompt and precise information which could be obtained only by means of a well-organized and intelligent staff. It was true that there was a commercial department at the Foreign Office; but, in order to answer all exigencies, there must be one such to each of two or three other departments. It would be far better to have a separate Ministry; and, he believed that its establishment would be a practical benefit to the country as well as to agriculture. It was urged, in the third place, by persons of high authority that there was no cause for complaint under the existing system, and that Commerce and Agriculture already received much more help under the existing machinery of Government than they suffered. The evidence, however, which he had received—and a great deal more which he could quote from the same quarter—conclusively proved, he thought, that that statement, as it would not have been true previous to 1864, was not correct as applied to the state of things at the present day. He thanked the House for the indulgence with which they had heard him, and would only say—representing, as he did, all shades of opinion amongst the agricultural and commercial classes — that they would gladly welcome a change in the direction he had indicated, from whatever Government or from whatever Party it might proceed. In conclusion, he trusted that Her Majesty's Government would consider this question; for it was to them that the country looked, now that party strife had somewhat abated, for measures of practical utility which would be accepted as evidence of their desire to promote the national welfare and prosperity. He would now move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. STORER, in seconding the Motion, said, there was a strong feeling existing among agriculturists on the subject. They believed that it would be for their interests that there should be a Department appointed to represent not only Commerce, but Agriculture also, and presided over by a Cabinet Minister. They thought if the change was made, that there would be a fair and direct representation of Agriculture in Parliament. He did not wish to cast any imputation on hon. Gentlemen who filled, or had filled, Government offices; but there was certainly a feeling in the country that when any question relating to Agriculture came on for discussion in the House it was most likely to be shelved. In proof of that, he need only point to the great difficulty which there was in obtaining any information as to the state of affairs on any agricultural question. The various questions were under so many different Departments that it was almost impossible to get any satisfactory answer, and a person was frequently referred from Department to Department, and sometimes even the Departments themselves did not know whether a particular matter came within their Department or not. He would also point out it was a very unsatisfactory arrangement that the management of cattle and the education of the country should be placed together in one Department. To that he thought was owing the fact that there was no adequate supervision of the traffic in cattle and other live stock, and in connection with the subject he would refer to the Report which had been issued to hon. Members from Mr. Holmes of the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council, who had been sent down to Deptford to attend a ship on board of which it was said that some animals had been treated with cruelty. Mr. Holmes had been sent down in consequence of a letter in The Times from Captain Stanley; but the incidental part of it was, that the gentleman reported that the cattle exhibited no indications of having received ill-treatment, but, on the other hand, were in a better condition than most of the cattle landed at Deptford—adding quite innocently, that those affected with foot-and-mouth disease, 34 in number, only had it very slightly. But out of 119 cattle 34 were affected with the disease, in this one ship; and this one of the best cargoes he had seen for some time! what must the worst have been? In the face of facts like these it was not much to be wondered at that agriculturists of this country should ask for the appointment of a Minister, nor that the country was inundated with cattle disease, and that the traders who relied for a living upon feeding and grazing were annually losing large sums of money through no fault of their own. He had lately seen a letter in the papers from the hon. Member for Aberdeenshire—a high authority on such matters—in which he estimated his own losses from foot-and-mouth disease alone at £2 per head; other farmers would give similar testimony. How great then must be the loss not only to the farmer but to the consuming public? This was the way things were now managed at home, but things were managed very differently abroad. He found that in Copenhagen, not much more than a month ago, the Minister of the Interior ordered that, in consequence of the prevalence of foot-and-mouth disease in Great Britain all cattle, sheep, goats, and pigs, imported therefrom should be kept isolated during three weeks at the cost of their owners and then submitted to veterinary examination before being handed over to their owners for disposal. In France, Germany, Hungary, Austria, and in the United States, and even in our own dependencies in India, there was a Minister clothed with the functions which would attach to a Minister of Agriculture in this country, and up to 1816 there had been a Board of Agriculture in this country, and to that board, in the year 1804, the celebrated Arthur Young was secretary. But somehow or other it had lapsed, and there was now no such body in existence, and he, for one, had failed to discover why it was discontinued. If it was that agriculture, by reason of the existence of protection, had at that time reached a state of prosperity which rendered legislative care no longer necessary the present was a period at which such care might advantageously be resumed, for the agricultural interest was now far from being prosperous. In some respects it was suffering from want of legislation, and in others it was overlegislated for—both circumstances being due to the fact that no one central Department was responsible for matters affecting agricultural interests. Farmers not only had natural difficulties to contend with, but difficulties arising from legislation, by which they were prevented from obtaining a sufficient supply of children for agricultural purposes. Besides that they were overburdened with local taxation, and had been saddled with still further expenses by the operation of the Education Act which had been passed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford. By that Act children were no longer allowed to be employed in agriculture, except under great difficulties; but were being educated for the benefit of the towns. The agricultural interest had borne many privations, although they were the last to desire a change in the existing institutions of the country. But the Returns issued showed how greatly the agricultural population both in England and Scotland was decreasing, and no wonder a difficulty was experienced in obtaining soldiers or recruits for the Militia or police, for a large number of agricultural labourers were now emigrating to the towns, from which they went abroad, or were so spoilt there that they never returned as agricultural labourers. In conclusion, he would say it should not be lost sight of that the agriculturists had in their hands the representation of the counties of England; but although that was the case, he was sure that they would never use that power but for legitimate purposes, and, therefore, they were entitled to every consideration in regard to the subject under notice at the hands of Her Majesty's Government, seeing their claim was simply fair and reasonable.

Mr. Storer

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, it is desirable that those functions of Her Majesty's Government which especially relate to Commerce and Agriculture should be administered under the direction of a Principal Secretary of State, who shall be a member of the Cabinet; and that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that She will be graciously pleased to give effect to this Resolution,"—(Mr. Sampson Lloyd.)

—instead thereof.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am sure, Sir, there will be but one feeling amongst hon. Members on both sides of the House as to the importance of the two great interests represented by those who have brought forward this Resolution this evening; and it is quite certain that if at any time questions are brought forward affecting the commercial or the agricultural interests, those questions will receive the attention and respectful consideration of any Government, from whatever Party it may be formed. But with regard to the particular Motion which my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. S. Lloyd) has submitted to the House, I would venture to make one or two remarks. I wish, however, in the first place, to deal with the question of the importance of having a special Department charged with directly looking after the interests of Agriculture and Commerce. My hon. Friend the Member for South Nottinghamshire (Mr. Storer) remarked just now that there was a Department of Agriculture up to the year 1816, and the hon. Member for Plymouth told us, in some detail, how a number of years ago there was a Commercial Department of the Board of Trade, which has now been given up, the duties of which, in fact, have been transferred to the Foreign Office. Now, I would ask my hon. Friends what is the natural inference to be drawn from these facts? There were certain Departments charged with those very duties which you now say are so important, and how is it that they have lost the functions assigned to them? Is it not, in fact, because it was found that the work gradually left them? Now I contend that you cannot by any artificial re-distribution restore that which in the nature of things was passed away from Government. It is, in fact, like the case of a shopkeeper who finds that his business is leaving him, and who feels that he cannot have recourse to any artificial stimulus to restore what in the nature of things is fading away. I do not remember, and I do not know that I have ever paid particular attention to, the circumstances under which the Department of Agriculture was given up. I believe it was attached at one time to the Board of Trade, and no doubt there were very good reasons for the abandonment of that arrangement. But I do remember very distinctly, and I have for many years had occasion to know, what the course of business has been at the Board of Trade. I have myself witnessed a great many of the changes which have occurred in the commercial business of that Department. I remember very well when I was first introduced to the Board of Trade in 1842, that a great deal of business was done of the kind to which my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth now seems principally to attach importance—that is to say, foreign business. A great deal of correspondence was carried on between the Board of Trade and other Departments with regard to treaties, legislation on commercial subjects, and other matters affecting the commercial interests of the country. But by degrees, as the system of reciprocity dwindled away before the spread of Free Trade ideas, as the Navigation Laws were repealed, and as complicated differential duties were abolished, the greater part of the commercial business left the Board of Trade of itself, and at the same time a process of a different kind began to take effect. A number of matters requiring careful administrative interference, such as the Railway system and the Mercantile Marine, came under the notice of the Government, and were handed over to the Board of Trade, which thus became a large and influential administrative Department. Whilst the change I have referred to was taking place there was no doubt still a Commercial Department at the Board of Trade keeping up correspondence with other offices—preaching to them sound doctrine upon a great many commercial matters. But, as my hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth has pointed out, and as the evidence taken before the Committee of 1864 shows, the business of the Board of Trade in that respect became less and less important—less and less efficacious—the Board of Trade having a large amount of important administrative duties to perform, and the great principles of commercial legislation and of the relations between England and foreign countries having assumed an entirely new aspect, and it in time became obvious that its commercial business, so to speak, had passed away from it. No doubt commercial questions, such as the duties on Portuguese wines, still arise which require to be dealt with; and under the former state of affairs those who were interested in the matter would have gone to the Board of Trade and laid their case before it. In that case the Board would have corresponded with other Departments; but, after all, it would have simply come to this—that in a matter of that kind there are two Departments whose action must be and would at any time have been supreme. The one is the Foreign Office, which would have to carry on the correspondence with foreign countries; and the other is the Treasury, in whose hands are deposited the fiscal interests of this country. It would even, under the old arrangement, have been impossible to entertain any question for altering the duties on Portuguese wines without having first obtained the approval and co-operation both of the Foreign Office and of the Treasury. The intervention of the Board of Trade would, therefore, really be of very little use in such a case, for it would be able to do little or nothing beyond what those directly interested in the question would be able themselves to achieve. Well, my hon. Friend says that the Minister at the head of the Department which has to deal with Commerce ought to be in the Cabinet, in order to strengthen his influence. Now there are many considerations which determine the number of Members who ought to form the Cabinet, and the particular Departments which, at one time or another, it may be desirable to have represented in the Cabinet. It is impossible that the head of every Department should be in the Cabinet without increasing the number of the Cabinet to a very inconvenient extent. At one time, it may be both convenient and desirable to have the Minister of Commerce in the Cabinet; at another time, the Minister of Education; at another time, the head of the Local Government Department, or the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and so on. No fixed rule, in fact, can be laid down for the number of those who should form the Cabinet at any particular period, as the exigencies of different times vary. But if it is of so much importance that the Minister of Commerce should be in the Cabinet, I would ask my hon. Friend what was the state of matters when the changes to which he has referred were made? Why, most of those changes occurred when the President of the Board of Trade was a Cabinet Minister, and it was with his concurrence that they were made. Therefore, it is not merely the fact of there being a Minister of Commerce in the Cabinet that would secure what my hon. Friend seems to desire. In these matters you ought not to be continually altering your machinery. You ought to devise and settle your policy, and then adapt your machinery to it. That is the only sound principle on which to go. Now, I am at a loss to conceive, from the speeches of my hon. Friends, what policy they recommend in this matter. Are we to rearrange the work of all the Departments which may be affected? My hon. Friend speaks of the foreign side of the Ministry of Commerce; but surely he would not say that the Minister of Commerce whom he asks for ought not to attend to a large number of home matters also which are connected with commerce but which are now dealt with by the Home Department, the Local Government Board, and the Board of Trade. The proposed Ministry, in fact, could not be formed without interfering with the duties of other Departments, and who is to say what duties belong properly to one Department and what to another? You would find that the establishment of a new Minister would be of no use, unless you laid down very clearly and distinctly what were to be the precise nature and extent of his duties. You cannot divide those duties so easily as you imagine. You must remember that these things run one into another. Many questions must, by their very nature, come sometimes under the consideration of one Department and sometimes under another. Therefore, though this matter has been before Parliament many times, though it has been investigated by Select Committees, yet no decision has been arrived at, and

I think it would be unwise of the House by adopting the present Resolution to pledge itself to a matter of which there is no denying the importance, but the exact outcome of which it is extremely difficult to foresee. I am afraid, therefore, it is not in the power of the Government to assent to the Motion, and I hope that the House will not allow itself to be led into what would really be the pursuit of a shadow, unless a more distinct plan be laid before it than the one now submitted by my hon. Friends.

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, that many of his constituents, and several of the Chambers of Commerce in the North of England with whom he had been brought in contact, took a deep interest in the subject which had been brought forward by the hon. Member for Plymouth, and he should on that account make a few observations upon it. He had himself given the question much consideration, having been Chairman of the Committee which sat in the year 1854, and he confessed he was still of opinion, and it was the unanimous conviction of the Committee, that there should be some good reason why the President of the Board of Trade should not be a member of the Cabinet. He, however, hoped right hon. Gentlemen opposite would not suppose he was making any charge against them for not making the President of the Board of Trade a Cabinet Minister. He was fully aware that there might be very good reasons for wishing to have a small Cabinet; but one of the advantages which would arise from having the question discussed was, that it might fairly lead to a consideration of it with a view to the future arrangement of Government business with regard to the management of the different Departments. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that we had much less to do now with tariffs with foreign countries than we used to have. That was true enough; but we were still constantly and seriously affected by the tariffs of foreign countries; and although this country was devoted to the principles of Free Trade, that did not imply that it was not the duty of the Government constantly to watch what other countries were doing, with a view, if possible, to secure an increase of our trade with foreign States. What commercial men felt was this—that, speaking generally, their interests might suffer from the fact that there was not in the consulting body of the Cabinet some Member who would specially represent their interests. “When matters of home policy,” they said, “matters of finance, of foreign negotiations, of Indian policy, were brought before the Government, we think that the commercial interests of Great Britain ought to be represented in the Cabinet; and there should be somebody to whom commercial men could go and say we must not be forgotten when those matters are under consideration.” He could not help thinking that that was a just and reasonable feeling to a certain extent; and without at all saying that his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade had less influence than he would have if he were in the Cabinet, he still thought that commercial men had reason for the strong protest which they made against the existing state of things. The words of the Resolution, however, when he came to consider them, went further than the House, he thought, would be at present willing to go, but as to one part of it there would be little difference of opinion—namely, that the Government business connected with Agriculture ought to be placed in the hands of the Minister who had charge of the Government business connected with Commerce. He could not help thinking that would be a wise change, whenever a Government had time to consider the subject of changes at all. Why should not all questions relating to cattle, for example, be taken from the Education Office and handed over to the Board of Trade, to which Department they naturally belonged, and where they would probably be better attended to? The same permanent staff could manage the business of both those branches. Or if they were to have a Minister of Agriculture, it would be far better that he should be Minister of Commerce also. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer said that it would not be well to increase over much the number of the Cabinet, and in that expression of opinion he concurred; but the fact should not be lost sight of that, in a general way, one or two Members of the Cabinet had hardly any official business to conduct. If it was desirable to keep down the numbers of a Cabinet, it was easy to see that the duties of a Minister of Commerce and Agriculture would be onerous, while the duties of a Lord Privy Seal, for instance, were not great. He thought the same remark would also apply to the President of the Council, although at the present moment he undertook agricultural work in regard to the cattle disease. He would further remark that he concurred with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the opinion that no disadvantage to the commercial community had arisen from the abolition of what might be called the Foreign Department of the Board of Trade, for the investigation of the Committee to which he had referred left upon his mind the strong impression that the Foreign Office must conduct all negotiations with foreign States. There could not be two sets of negotiators representing the Government of this country, and commercial men ought not to have to go to the Board of Trade to make representations in order that that Department should communicate those representations to the Foreign Office. They ought to go direct to the Minister who had to do the work, and who would be more likely to do it well if he felt that the full responsibility rested upon him. The Minister of Commerce ought not to be a kind of adviser to the Foreign Office, but that did not remove the necessity of having the interests of Commerce and Agriculture represented by a Minister who should be a Member of the Cabinet.

MR. MARK STEWART gathered from the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he thought the present state of affairs sufficiently satisfactory, and that really no change was required; but it must be admitted, not only from what they had heard that night, but from the meetings which had lately been held both north and south of the Tweed, that among those who were interested in agriculture a very strong and earnest feeling prevailed on the subject which his hon. and learned Friend had brought under the consideration of the House. It was not that the Board of Trade did not give heed to subjects which were laid before it; it was not that the Vice President of the Council was not ready to act upon suggestions which were made to him, but it was because agriculturists generally thought that their interests were not sufficiently considered, or, at all events, were not sufficiently made known. Two points suggested themselves to his mind which he thought would go far to prove what he said. Last Session, for example, there was a short discussion in that House upon the subject of the very great evils arising from the existence of pleuropneumonia in Ireland. Having been a sufferer on his own farm from that disease, or a disease very like it, among his cattle, he felt the great importance of having a Minister in the Cabinet who would take into consideration the serious charge which had been over and over again made in respect of Ireland—that the stamping-out of that fatal disease had not been enforced, and that it was being propagated in England and Scotland because the Order on the subject was not put in force. He only rose to say that—speaking from his own knowledge—though as regarded Commerce he was quite ready to take his views from the Chancellor of the Exchequer—it was the earnest wish of agriculturists that there should be some recognized Member of the Government in the Cabinet to consider questions affecting Agriculture. Reference had been made in the debate to the population of rural towns, and he thought that, for instance, was a subject which should come under the surveillance of such a Member of the Cabinet. Considering the enormous mass of capital now sunk in the land, it would be very important that the Government should, if not this, in some future Session deal with the matter.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth (Mr. S. Lloyd) has brought forward a subject which both sides of the House acknowledge to be important and interesting; but, at the same time, I may remind my hon. and learned Friend that it is not now brought under our consideration for the first time. It has occupied the attention of the House and of Committees, and, at various periods, the distribution of duties among the Public Offices has been considered by some of the most eminent Members of Parliament. We must always remember, Sir, that we are dealing with the official hierarchy of an ancient kingdom, and that when we fix upon some particular office and judge from its name that it should be devoted to particular duties, we may really deceive ourselves by being precisely accurate. You may have an office called the Board of Trade which has been so called for many generations, and yet the control or attention to details of trade may become obsolete as far as that office is concerned. On the other hand, duties may have been transferred to that office which have arisen from circumstances attending modern civilization, and which it may admirably perform, though the office still retains its ancient title "Board of Trade." That is remarkably the case in the instance of the particular office in question; because, no doubt, a great amount of the duties of the Board of Trade can hardly be classed under the names of Trade or Commerce, and yet they are duties which deeply interest the people of this country, and are efficiently performed by that office. If, again, we consider what are the real commercial interests with which the Ministry as at present constituted in this country should interfere, I think it will be seen that they are such commercial interests as would call for the interference of the Foreign Office. In 99 out of 100 commercial interests which call for—and which, indeed, may be said have a right to demand—the attention of the Government—the intervention of the Foreign Office is required. My hon. Friend the Member for South Nottinghamshire (Mr. Storer) has evinced a great desire that the interests of Agriculture should be represented in the Cabinet. I think more than one of my hon. Friends have impressed upon the House that the ravages of pleuropneumonia might probably have been stayed or diminished if there had been a Cabinet Minister to attend to the interests of Agriculture; but the fact is there has been a Cabinet Minister all this time attending to those interests as connected with pleuropneumonia, and not only is he a Cabinet Minister, but he happens to be a very distinguished practical farmer. Therefore, it does not appear to me that the point can be substantiated. If a Government lasts for any considerable period we may practically say there is no time when the distribution of the duties among the various offices of the Government does not occupy some part of their attention. I and my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer last year had many conferences on that subject, and I recollect it was suggested that the duties of some of the offices that were over-burdened should be transferred to that of the Lord Privy Seal. I am not at all clear that such an arrangement might not be made, and I entirely agree with the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. W. E. Forster) that the Lord President of the Council has now so much to attend to, that if a convenient arrangement could be made to give protection to agricultural interests against foreign plagues and pestilences, in the form of pleuro-pneumonia and other diseases, that question should not be lost sight of. But, at the same time, what the House should guard against, is rashly creating new offices. In my opinion, the administrative body of this country is sufficiently strong and competent to discharge all the duties of the State; but there is no doubt that some re-distribution might occasionally be made in the public offices of the country, which would render the fulfilment of their duties more efficient. At the same time, I must say, with regard to the Lord Privy Seal, it is a great mistake to suppose that he has nothing to do because very little is performed in his mere office. Whenever there is a difficult business which a Minister finds it impossible for him to attend to individually, through the great pressure of affairs in his office, the first person thought of is the Lord Privy Seal, and we find in practice the Lord Privy Seal is not that indolent monstrosity which is imagined. I can hardly think that my hon. Friend will ask the House for a division upon this question. He was quite right in bringing it forward: and there is not the slightest doubt that the subject of the re-distribution of official duties is one which must always engage the attention of the Government. There have been in my time many changes in all Departments, and all of them, I think, were improvements. In no Department has there been more changes than in the Board of Trade itself; but they have been rendered necessary by the great diversity of circumstances in our present national life and the new wants of the progressive civilization of this country. More changes are going on in the public offices than is generally supposed, and I believe that those changes, being effected from a sense of their necessity, are meeting the difficulties and deficiencies which inevitably must occasionally be discovered in the system of administration, more completely than the House perhaps imagines. The observations which have been made to-night will not be lost sight of by the Government. They will encourage us in our efforts to improve some branches of our administration, and I trust it will be found that by availing ourselves of some of the suggestions which have been thrown out, and others which have occurred to us from our experience, we may in any alterations which we may make render the administration of this country more effective.

MR. WHITWELL said, he quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, when he said that the Board of Trade had become so overlaid with business that the trade and commerce of the country had been lost sight of. If we had a Foreign Secretary or Under Secretary connected with Trade, the commercial interests might find their affairs properly managed; but there was only a very small section of the Foreign Office to whom they could go with their representations, and instead of strengthening that Department, it would be much better to appoint a Minister of Commerce and Agriculture. When they considered that many of their foreign Commercial Treaties would within the next two years have to be re-arranged, they could not exaggerate the great importance of the subject, and he wished the Government to understand that there was a strong body in that House, composed of Members from both sides, who believed that sooner or later there must be a Minister in the Cabinet to superintend the interests of Commerce and Agriculture.

METROPOLIS—THE LONDON THEATRES —PROVISION IN CASE OF FIRE.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR WILLIAM FRASER, in rising to call attention to the inadequate provision for the safety of the public in case of fire in the London Theatres, said, that in 1866 it was calculated that there were 60,000 persons in the London theatres every evening, and 200,000 persons in other places of amusement; and those numbers must now have greatly increased. All the evidence on this subject showed that the means of exit in case of panic or fire were insufficient. A Select Committee, known as "Mr. Ayrton's Committee," sat in 1866, but it took evidence principally in regard to the question whether the licensing power of the Lord Chamberlain or that of the Middlesex magistrates should be united under one person or not. Into that question, which still remained unsettled, he did not intend to enter. At present the theatres were licensed by the Lord Chamberlain, who had a small staff under his direction, while the places of amusement were licensed by the Middlesex magistrates in Quarter Sessions. With regard to the risk of fire, many theatres had been burnt down, and it was said that there was a regular rotation in the order of their burning; unfortunately science had not advanced so far as to show on what particular evening a theatre would be burnt. Still, persons experienced in fire insurance would point out the probabilities of particular theatres being burnt at a certain time. It appeared that shortly before Covent Garden Theatre was last burnt down, a wish was expressed to increase the insurance. The agent, however, declined, observing—"Very shortly your turn will come; and then down you will go." From the evidence of Mr. Donne, given before Mr. Ayrton's Committee, it seemed that the rules of the Lord Chamberlain's office as to exits and entrances were strict, and that the Lord Chamberlain had the power of taking precautions that the places of exit were wide enough to secure the safety of the audience in case of fire. It was doubtful, however, whether the staff at the Lord Chamberlain's disposal was sufficient; and whether the circumstances under which those powers were exercised were calculated to secure the safety of the public in case either of fire or panic. He wished also to ask a question relating to the employment and payment of the police in the theatres and other places of amusement in the metropolis. From a Return issued that day he learned that the lessees of theatres had paid the police £1,571 5s. 1d.; and the question arose whether they were there in the interest of the public or in that of the managers, with the latter of whom they must necessarily be on friendly terms.

Sir William Fraser

If the police were placed there for the protection of the public, he thought the responsibility in case of fire or panic ought to rest upon them. No one wished to interfere with the emoluments of actors, a harmless, unobtrusive, and hard-working race, but the interests of the public should be considered; and he thought that, considering the enormous profits now accruing to theatrical proprietors, the present was an opportune time for bringing the subject forward.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS said, no one could find fault with the hon. and gallant Member for bringing forward that subject, which was one of great public interest and importance. He wished he could state positively that there was no danger of fire in any of our theatres, but that it would be difficult to do, because many of these theatres had been built a long time ago, and could not have the benefit of all the most improved modern arrangements. At the same time, he was bound to say great care was taken by the authority in whose hands all power in this respect was vested, and that was, not the Secretary of State, but the Lord Chamberlain. That functionary informed him that theatres were the only buildings that were liable to supervision in that respect; and there were no doubt other places where people congregated in which they were exposed to greater danger than they were in theatres. The Lord Chamberlain said of theatres—

"They are regularly inspected by the Lord Chamberlain's officers, with a competent architect, who report that there is not now a theatre in London which could not be cleared in a very few minutes; that there are none in which there are not separate and distinct exits from boxes, pit, and gallery; that, with very few exceptions, there are double means of exit from each of these separate portions of the house, so that if one were blocked the other could be used in case of danger; that the doors are all made to open outwards, to swing both ways, or to fasten back; and that the greatest precautions are taken to prevent fire, and to extinguish it at once if it arises, by water supply, hose, &c."

If any theatres were to be rebuilt, it would be wise to borrow one improvement from abroad, and that would be to make any passage in which two passages were united as wide, or nearly as wide, as the two separate passages together, for a block was generally due to the meeting of streams of persons in one corridor. In any future re-constructions he hoped this point would be attended to by architects. He was sorry the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board was not present to speak for the Metropolitan Fire Brigade, but he had spoken to the hon. and gallant Member, who would be glad to learn on the part of the Board if anything more could be done to promote the safety of the public. With regard to the question relating to the employment and payment of police in theatres and other places of amusement in the metropolis, they were in most cases specially employed at the request of the lessees, who paid for their services. Those services were these—The police regulated the admission of the public and the preservation of order during the performance, and they assisted the manager or his servants in ejecting any riotous or disorderly person. The police did not interfere with, nor were they in any way responsible for the arrangements made for the prevention of fire. When necessary, the police on ordinary duty regulated the carriage traffic at all theatres. He held in his hand a copy of the General Police Orders on the subject of theatres. He was not aware that any complaints had been made of the way in which the police had performed their duty at the theatres; but if any such complaints were made he would see that they were properly attended to. He believed that, so far, the police had performed their duty effectually without causing unnecessary inconvenience or annoyance. If there was any theatre to which special attention should be directed, or of which complaint could be made, he would do his best to see that attention was paid to any representations that reached him.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE COSTS OF PROSECUTIONS—TREASURY MINUTES.
OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GORST, in rising to call attention to the disallowances enforced by the Treasury in respect of the costs of Criminal Prosecutions, said, the Treasury Minute of the 29th January last, which was intended to remove the grievances of local ratepayers, had introduced another grievance; and if it had been in order at that stage, he would have submitted a Motion embodying his contention that the whole of the prosecutions in England ought to be defrayed out of monies provided as heretofore by Parliament without those deductions which had of late years been, as he maintained, improperly made therefrom. He very much regretted that the Forms of the House would not permit him to move his Resolution, because he believed it would have met with general acceptance. Practically, it was identical with one which was moved by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), and which was on that occasion supported by the present Prime Minister and the present Home Secretary. The state of things of which he complained was neither fair to the ratepayers nor conducive to the due administration of justice. The grievance of the ratepayers was this—that whereas it had been intended by Parliament and admitted by the Government of the country that all the costs of the prosecution of offenders should be borne, not by the local rates, but out of the Imperial Treasury, yet, owing to what he regarded as the unlawful intervention of certain subordinate officers of the Treasury, the intentions of Parliament had been defeated and an irregular portion of the costs of these prosecutions was, contrary to the intention of Parliament, saddled on the local ratepayers. Since 1846 the intention of Parliament in the matter had been considered quite clear—namely, to relieve the ratepayers of counties and boroughs entirely from the costs of those prosecutions, and accordingly the costs were taxed by the proper officers in various Courts of Justice in the manner provided for by law, and when the order of the Court was made it was compulsory that it should be obeyed. The costs being paid the Bills were taken to the Treasury, whose duty it then became, after satisfying themselves that the money had been paid, to refund the money paid in the first instance. That intention was defeated by the interference of the Department of Examiners of the Criminal Law Accounts, who, under the provisions of no Act of Parliament, but merely under the directions of the Government of the day, reviewed the taxation of the proper taxing officers and made deductions, which they called their schedule of disallowances, knocking off a shilling here, and sixpence there, and thus saddling the sums disallowed upon the counties and boroughs. The County of Lancaster appealed to the Court of Queen's Bench in 1871 against this state of things, when Sir Robert Collier advised that the Treasury disallowances were totally indefensible. Next year, Lancashire, West Yorkshire, and other counties came to the Court, which unanimously disapproved the allowances, while holding that it had no jurisdiction over the Treasury, and expressed the opinion that the conduct of the Treasury was illegal, and a violation of the Appropriation Act. When this subject was brought under the consideration of the House there was a long debate but no division. Why? Because no one ventured to dispute the facts alleged or the conclusions arrived at by the hon. Baronet. Mr. Bruce and Mr. Winterbotham had nothing to say in defence of the Home Office or the Treasury; Mr. Cross supported the hon. Baronet in an able speech; Mr. Henley characterized the proceeding as a piece of robbery and swindling—nobody contradicted him; the present Prime Minister twitted the Chancellor of the Exchequer because he had not ventured to show himself; and finally, Mr. Baxter promised that the subject should receive the immediate consideration of the Government. The whole proceeding was admitted to be indefensible, and therefore the hon. Baronet withdrew the Motion. That was the way in which the grievance had been treated by the House of Commons, and yet, though denounced by all these high authorities, it had survived in full vigour till January this year. The Treasury Minute dealing with the subject was dated the 29th of January, and no doubt the intention was very fair. But there were several serious objections to it. The first blunder in connection with the Minute to which he would direct attention was, the strange assumption on which it proceeded that all the disallowances made in past years were lawful and proper. Nobody who read the Minute would suppose that these disallowances had been denounced by the Members of the very Government who agreed to the Minute. He should like to give the House one or two specimens of the disallowances which the Treasury were in the habit of making in the cost of prosecutions. In January, 1874, a case occurred at the Quarter Sessions for the county of Lancaster, held in the town of Lancaster. The Chairman of Quarter Sessions expressly ordered that a witness resident in London should be summoned by a Crown Office subpoena. It was served at a cost of £1 1s. 5d. That sum was disallowed, and the Chairman of the Quarter Sessions was Richard Assheton Cross, the present Home Secretary. Since 1872 the Treasury had invariably disallowed the costs of a warder attending the trial of a previously convicted criminal unless the prisoner pleaded "Not Guilty;" but the prisoner generally pleaded "Guilty" to a previous indictment, because he saw before him the familiar face of the warder under whom he had served, and the Treasury took upon itself, contrary to law, to disallow the costs of the warder's attendance, and imposed the burden on the ratepayers of counties and boroughs. The Treasury was also in the habit of deducting small sums of 3d. and 1s. from the railway fares of witnesses, and when complaint was made the Treasury expressed surprise that gentlemen troubled themselves with items of such small amount. The fees payable when prisoners were remanded were disallowed, although it was declared by the Court of Queen's Bench that such disallowances were improper. In one case an indictment had been specially ordered by the Judge of Assize to be prepared by counsel, and the fees were disallowed. In a case in the county of Kent the Treasury had disallowed 16s. charged for a fly to convey a Justice when snow was on the ground to take the deposition of a dying man. In another recent case which occurred at the Liverpool Assizes a man was convicted for felony. After his conviction it was found he was possessed of £33, and an order of Court was made on the testimony of a witness from Blackburn that the money should be applied to pay the costs of the prosecution. The Treasury took the £33, and disallowed the expenses of the witness by whose evidence the criminal had been convicted. Another objection he took to the Minute of January last had reference to the improper and invidious distinction which it made between clerks of Assize and clerks of the peace. The effect of the Minute was, that the Treasury accepted the taxation in the case of the former, while reviewing it in the case of the latter. The Treasury refused to accept the taxation of the clerk of the peace, because they said he was amenable to the authorities for the proper discharge of his duties; but the Chancellor of the Exchequer must have been misinformed on that point, because the clerks of the peace were officers appointed in counties by the Lord Lieutenant, who certainly did not represent the ratepayers. His next objection was that under the Minute, the Treasury proposed to strike an average of the costs for prosecutions for the last three years, and to pay at the rate allowed, which would, in fact, make perpetual the illegal transactions of the last three years. The cost of prosecutions at Quarter Sessions was an increasing amount for two reasons—first, because the smaller cases were now disposed of summarily much more than they used to be; and, secondly, because the Court of Quarter Sessions now tried heavy and important cases, which were formerly remitted to the Assizes. He held in his hands a Return received from the county of Lancaster, which might serve as a specimen. From that Return it appeared that during the three years preceding 1874 the costs of prosecutions at the Assizes were £7,582, while the costs of prosecutions at the Quarter Sessions for the same period were no less than £25,683. The average number of prosecutions was 2,726, so that the average cost of each was £9 8s. 6d. But, the number of prosecutions during the half-year, ending December 31, 1874—when the new system had come into operation—was 568, and the amount of the county claim was £5,585, showing an average of £9 16s. 8d., so that the costs of each prosecution had increased by 8s., or a little more. If the Treasury made the average deductions from the amount claimed they would reduce it by £16 10s.; but, according to the new scheme of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the claim would be reduced by £234. Therefore, the new scheme would have the effect the first half-year—he would not say, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) had said—of “robbing,” but of depriving the ratepayers of the county of Lancaster of £218. In the borough of Liverpool the same process would deprive the ratepayers of nearly £200 upon the half-year, and he had no doubt it would be found that the ratepayers of every borough and county in England would be deprived of large sums in a similar manner. Another thing to be remarked was the insidious intentions which it was apparent the Treasury had for the future. The examiners of criminal law costs were not to be abolished. There was still to be an examination of bills from Assizes and Quarter Sessions, not with a view to making deductions, but with a view to a possible revision of the matter at the end of three years, at which time he had no doubt we should have a very great reduction. Now, there were two reasons why the Treasury Minute ought not to be persevered in. The first was, that, according to the Judges of the land, the practice which this Minute proposed to establish was illegal; and Parliament was not going to pass an Act which would prevent the ratepayers from being re-imbursed to the full amount of the costs. The second reason was that the practical effect of the Minute on the administration of justice would be very injurious; because, under the pretence of removing a grievance, it would really aggravate it. The Minute also would have this effect—that the Justices would cease to remit all the heavier cases to be tried at Quarter Sessions, and the Assizes would be overburdened with work. Suppose the Justices had a case brought before them, the probable costs of which would be £80, while only £9 10s. would be allowed by the Treasury, they would send it to the Assizes, because then the whole of the costs would be paid by the Treasury. In conclusion, he wished to be allowed to point the moral of this matter, because though in itself trifling, it was important as involving a great question of principle. Here was an abuse condemned by the Judges, by the Attorney General or the Solicitor General of the day, in defence of which no one would lift up his voice in the House of Commons, and which the Government, three or four years ago, promised should be immediately attended to. In the month of January, however, it appeared not only that the old grievances had been retained, but that fresh ones of the very worst kind had been introduced; and that circumstance showed how very little control the House of Commons, or the Ministers of the Crown, had over the persons who regulated these matters.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that his hon. Friend had made grave imputations against the

Treasury, and had used rather strong language, talking about illegal proceedings in a manner calculated to mislead the House and to divert its attention from the real position of the case. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) was not for a moment going to question the propriety or the authority of the expression of opinion on the part of the Judges of the land respecting this question. What he understood the Judges to have said was this—that Parliament, having appropriated a certain sum for a certain purpose, it was a wrong and not a legal proceeding on the part of the officers of the Treasury to put the construction which they did put upon the vote of Parliament, or to make any deduction from the costs when they had been taxed by the proper authorities. Upon that opinion, he could understand that it might be contended that what was done down to 1874 was illegal; that the Treasury might, strictly speaking, have been guilty of some breach of law in making the deductions. But, however that might have been before 1874, it must be borne in mind that the matter was one in which the House of Commons had it in its power to give or withhold what it thought right from year to year; and what was now in question was not whether the deductions which the Treasury had made in former years were or not strictly legal; but what was to be the principle upon which grants were to be made for the future? Would the House or his hon. Friend admit the principle that Parliament should make payments in respect of expenses of this kind without submitting them to any audit or examination at all? Usually, when Parliament made a grant for a specific purpose, it took care, through the agency of the proper officer, that the money was applied to the purpose for which it was voted and to no other. Now, although fault might be found with particular disallowances, the examinations referred to by his hon. Friend were in the nature of an audit undertaken on the part of the Government, acting in order to see that the grant was properly applied, in fulfilment of the intentions of Parliament. Now, was that a vexatious or merely unnecessary proceeding on the part of Parliament? The history of the matter was this. In former times Parliament granted, not the whole, but half the costs of prosecutions to the local authorities; but in 1846, Sir Robert Peel thought it a reasonable boon to grant the whole instead of only a moiety. The effect was that within three or four years after, the expense of prosecutions jumped up by one-fifth. Was it not obvious, therefore, that less control was exercised than had previously been the case? When the Examiners were first appointed, and called upon to look into the expenditure, they undoubtedly found that very considerable laxity and abuse existed. The course taken, therefore, whether strictly legal or not in subjecting these payments to the examination of competent persons, was in itself not an unreasonable course, although he admitted there had been a good deal of vexation in some of the challenges. The system as it was worked had necessarily caused considerable annoyance; but was it proposed to throw the reins entirely upon the necks of the taxing officers, to let them charge what they pleased, and to permit them to double the authorized scale if they thought fit to do so? It could hardly be contended seriously that nobody ought to take any notice, but that the Treasury should pay whatever demand was made upon it. Did hon. Members believe that such a system would really be in the interest of the ratepayers, or that if commenced it could possibly endure? A suggestion had been thrown out in the Treasury Minute, which was in the hands of most hon. Members, and the Government intended to ask the House to vote the money this year in accordance with that suggestion. If the House granted the money on the conditions set forth in the Minute, there would be no illegality in the money being applied in the way proposed. What was illegal was that money which had been voted by Parliament without condition was subsequently made subject to a condition. If that were so, then any question of illegality should be set aside, because it only confused the matter. The point raised was one touching the whole system upon which grants were to be made in aid of local taxation. In that matter the Government were not proceeding upon niggardly principles, for it was the intention of the Government and the practice they were introducing, to assist local taxation by subventions, and liberal subventions, from the Treasury. There might be some diminution in this particular case; but, if so, it would be as a drop in the ocean, compared with the new subventions which the Government were giving and intended to continue. If the House, however, refused to allow any system of control or to accept the principle of a gross payment, leaving a margin to be dealt with by the local authorities, the hands of the Government would be weakened in pursuing the course proposed. In the case of the police, the Treasury gave a certain portion of the money, and must necessarily see that it was properly applied. In the case of lunatics, the Government also gave a lump sum, and it was a subvention which might or might not meet the whole cost; but a margin of it had to be defrayed by the local authority, and the Government saw that the money was applied to the purpose for which it was intended. He hoped that the time might come when they would look more fully into this question, and others connected with the administration of justice; indeed, the present was only one portion of a great subject. But in all these matters they desired to take the House with them, and to proceed upon liberal principles, whilst, at the same time, they excluded waste and extravagance. He failed to gather from what his hon. Friend had told them what it was that he wished them to do, unless it was to abstain altogether from any audit. The Government wished to see whether in process of time the costs of prosecutions would increase, and, also, whether it would not be possible to revise the different tables of fees so as to bring about an approach to uniformity throughout the country. At present there were great variations in the scale of fees between one part of the country and another, and to produce anything like uniformity would require great consideration, and would be no easy matter to effect. He had no wish to say anything in defence of, or in mitigation of, those disallowances of the examiners, on which his hon. Friend had made such severe remarks. He knew that they had given rise to constant complaints, but he must do the examiners the justice to say that many of the disallowances had to be made over and over again, because the local authorities would continually send up their accounts with the same errors in them, and out of £5,000, about £3,000 had to be disallowed, including items which the local authorities had no justification for making on the plea of ignorance. To some extent it was true that the charges were made at Assizes by persons over whom the local authorities had no control, and it was partially so with regard to session cases, and it was on that ground that what his hon. Friend called an invidious distinction was made between Assize and session prosecutions. He (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) could not admit that clerks of the peace stood on the same footing as clerks of Assize, and he was under the impression that until now, that greater powers of dismissal existed in the local authorities with regard to clerks of the peace than appeared to be the case; but any person who knew the relations that existed between clerks of the peace and magistrates must know that, as a rule, they had more influence over them than they had over clerks of Assize, and that they would not like to be exposing their counties time after time to losses in consequence of returns so made by them. It was a choice of difficulties. The charge had not been made for the purpose of saving a few hundred pounds, but upon a principle, and in giving a lump sum, it was done in the belief that it was equivalent to what had hitherto been paid, and given so as to avoid all those questions of dispute and get rid of that vexation and annoyance that arose between the Treasury and the local authorities, without at the same time the counties being losers by the change. If, however, it should appear to be otherwise—if the scale was fixed at too low a rate, there would always exist the power of revising it and of doing justice. He earnestly hoped that the new arrangement would be found to work satisfactorily, but if not, probably some compromise might be come to that would be satisfactory to both parties.

MR. SCOURFIELD said, he did not think, when they looked to the great wealth of England and the importance of criminal prosecutions, that the expenses of those prosecutions were at all out of proportion to what they might be reasonably expected to be. He was anxious that justice might be done without extravagance, but thought that the principle of averages was as unlike a sound principle as anything that could be devised, because it was giving to one more than he ought to have, and giving to another nothing. A strong feeling was entertained in the counties that, in consequence of the miserable economy on the part of the Treasury in the matter of the costs of prosecutions, justice was continually being defeated. He believed the allowance to scientific witnesses was miserably inadequate; and, in conclusion, he endorsed every statement which had been made by the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst).

MR. PAGET said, he had had some experience of the subject under consideration, having to officiate as Chairman of Quarter Sessions in the county of Somerset. Their proceedings were governed by an Order made by Sir George Grey in 1858, which was exceedingly unjust; and when they applied to the Treasury to have a more satisfactory rule instituted, the reply was, that if the Justices of Somersetshire made a special application on the subject, it would be considered, but the Order itself could not be departed from. He gave the Government credit for a desire to keep down expenditure, but the principle on which disallowances were made was wrong, and must be wrong; for how could Examiners sitting at Westminster have any knowledge of the circumstances connected with the various charges which they investigated? He contended that the whole system of audit could never prove satisfactory, unless it was an audit conducted on the spot by a properly appointed taxing officer. He gave the Chancellor of the Exchequer credit for the best intentions, but no average scale would get rid of the irritation that prevailed, or meet the views of the ratepayers, who believed that they had a legal and moral right to the return of the expenses paid by them for criminal prosecutions.

MR. PELL thought it was hardly necessary to add anything to the illustrations which had been given by his hon. Friend who had introduced the subject (Mr. Gorst), but there were circumstances which irritated not only the ratepayers of the county he had the honour to represent, but also the magistrates and officers who served under them, to which he felt it his duty to refer. In the county of Shropshire the sum allowed to attorneys by the Court of Quarter Sessions was £3 3s. The officials of the county of Leicester communicated with the Treasury on the subject, remarking that it was rather hard that £3 3s. should be allowed in Shropshire, whilst, when £2 2s. was asked for in the county of Leicester, the amount was reduced to £1 1s. In answer to that communication the Lords of the Treasury said the sum paid by the Court in Shropshire was unusually high, but that it had been fixed many years ago, and their Lordships had no power to alter that which had been the custom so long. The same principle, however, had not been observed with regard to Leicestershire, where the charge of £2 2s. had for a long period of time been customary, and he wanted to know by what authority the allowance had been reduced. He thought the Government had not made out a case for treating the costs incurred at Courts of Quarter Sessions in a different manner from those incurred at Courts of Assize. He believed that the clerks of the peace in counties were as scrupulous and as careful about the amounts they allowed for costs as they could well be, and he could not see why their work should be dealt with differently from that of the clerks of Assize. The Chancellor of the Exchequer having asked how the case was to be met, he would venture to suggest that the right course would be for the Government to take the whole cost of criminal prosecutions into their own hands, to deal with all criminal prosecutions through their own officers, and meet the expenses with respect to them, and not inflict on the ratepayers vexatious, and often heavy charges, which they had no power whatever to control. He hoped at least that the Government would re-consider the part of the Treasury Minute relating to the costs of prosecutions at Quarter Sessions.

MR. WHITWELL said, the only difficulty he felt about the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposal was that the right hon. Gentleman had taken his data on too limited a scale, and that some counties were so small that the adoption of an average of three years would operate unfairly in their case. He would prefer if the Treasury would take those charges altogether into its own hands from the first—an arrangement which he thought would conduce to economy, and relieve Justices of the Peace from the necessity of making disallowances.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, these grants from the Consolidated Fund for criminal prosecutions commenced in 1836, and they had ever since gone on increasing in amount—a result which they might expect from all Imperial grants for local objects. The grant was largely extended in 1846 by the late Sir Robert Peel, on condition of the charge being subjected to audit, and this check the Chancellor of the Exchequer was right in strictly enforcing. But seeing how troublesome this duty must be, and how difficult it was for a Government to enforce this right over persons who were not in the direct service of the State, he could not refrain from expressing an earnest hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would see his way yet to put an end to these payments by some transfer of taxes now collected for the Imperial Exchequer, but which more properly belonged to the localities, so that they might manage their own affairs, and, amongst other payments, provide for those of criminal prosecutions.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS I.—PUBLIC WORKS AND BUILDINGS.

(1.) £25,707, to complete the sum for Royal Palaces.

MR. ADAM asked for some explanation with regard to the accounts in connection with the Vote under consideration? There appeared to have been some change in the course of proceeding this year in respect to the Commissioner of Works, the accounting officer being the Secretary to the Commission.

MR. W. H. SMITH replied that there had been no real alteration. The Public Accounts Committee of 1871 laid it down distinctly that a particular person should be made responsible for the accounts of each Department, and that principle had been acted upon by the late Government, by a Treasury Minute in 1873.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR complained of the way in which this Estimate had been presented to the Committee. In this one Estimate the principal officer under the First Commissioner had been selected to account for the expenditure, whereas in all the other Departments, either the head of the office, or a subordinate of lower position had been named as the accounting officer. It was opening a great cause of difference to vest in the principal officer the accounting duties. It gave the party a right to exercise an independence of his chief, calculated to lead to differences; but it was gravely objectionable in a financial point of view to confide to the head executive officer the combination of duties which made him responsible for the right execution of his Chief's orders and the power of recording their results; the best means a Chief could use for seeing to the right fulfilment of orders was the financial record by a separate officer of the effect of the orders. He would also take this opportunity to urge that some explanation ought to be given as to how the lodges in the Royal Parks had been disposed of.

MR. DILLWYN thought some superior officer of the Government ought to account to the House for the manner in which the money was spent.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he would not enter into any details as to the motives which led his hon. Friend the Secretary of the Treasury to adopt the regulation laid down by the late Government; but in order to ease the minds of his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Sir George Balfour) and the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), he would inform them at once, that if he were not absolutely responsible to the House of Commons for the Votes in Class I. of the Civil Service Estimates he should not now be sitting on that bench, and should not insult the Committee by proposing the Votes.

MR. DILLWYN said, that at the accession of Her Majesty, the Royal Parks and Palaces were, with few exceptions, made over to the State. In July, 1851, it was stated that a right was reserved to bestow the lodges in the Parks upon persons for distinguished services, and he would like to know whether the Duc d'Aumale occupied the lodge in Bushey Park, and also who was ranger of Greenwich Park and who occupied the lodge there, and what distinguished services those who occupied those lodges had rendered to the nation?

MR. MELLOR desired to know whether it was true that the Master of the Horse let the whole of the grazing in Bushey Park, and that the rent was a perquisite of his own?

DR. LUSH asked, whether a portion of the roadway opposite Clarence House had been taken away entirely from the use of the public. If so, by whose authority it had been done?

LORD HENRY LENNOX replied, that Bushey Park was occupied not by the Duc d'Aumale, but by Lord Alfred Paget, Clerk-Marshal to the Queen, and a very old servant of the Crown. As to the Ranger's Lodge at Blackheath, it was now unoccupied, but Her Majesty had allowed Prince Arthur to reside there for a few months while he was discharging his military duties. The cost to the country of the maintenance of that Lodge was extremely trifling. The grazing at Bushey Park was not considered as a perquisite of the Master of the Horse, who had to pay a rental for it, and he trusted the absolute amount of the rent both at Hampton Court and Bushey would shortly be settled. The new Master of the Horse had not been anxious to give up that which the old Master of the Horse had occupied for so long a time rent free. It was, however, decided about six weeks before the present Government came into office that the Office of Works had a right to obtain the amount from the Master of the Horse. Negotiations were still pending between himself and the Earl of Bradford on the subject. He thought that there must be a wrong impression in reference to the alterations made near Clarence House, as he understood that the pavement which used to run under the alcove had simply been removed to the other side of the road. This was all that had been done. When the Duke of Edinburgh's marriage was announced, it was found that the accommodation at Clarence House was absolutely insufficient to enable him to bring his Imperial bride there. The alterations had been made exclusively at the expense of His Royal Highness, and therefore he thought they could not object to the alterations.

MR. WHITWELL asked, whether the Master of the Horse would in the new arrangements pay up the arrears of rental for the grazing of Bushey Park?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that that would form a very important part of the arrangement.

MR. DILLWYN said, he understood that Prince Arthur occupied the Lodge at Greenwich for more than a few months?

LORD HENRY LENNOX explained that His Royal Highness had occupied it for two years, while he was studying his military duties.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £92,467, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1876, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."

MR. DILLWYN moved to reduce the Vote by £2,431, on the ground that no reason had been assigned in the Estimates for an increase in that amount over and above of last year. The Parks were for the ornamentation of the metropolis, unremunerative and not required for the public service and any increase in the Estimates on account of them ought to be carefully watched.

MR. ANDERSON inquired where the Albert Road and the Longford River Parks were situated? His education had been so sadly neglected that he did not know anything about them.

LORD HENRY LENNOX, in reply, said, he hoped the Committee, after his explanation, would not think there was any necessity for a division upon the question. In these days, when the facilities for travelling were so great, the beauty of the Parks in the neighbourhood of the metropolis was frequently enjoyed by a large number of persons who resided in the country as well as by Londoners. The extra sums required this year under the Vote were for keeping the Serpentine clear of weeds, so as to prevent it from being blocked and the fish from being destroyed; for maintaining the Albert Memorial; for replacing the rotten fencing round Bushey Park; for paying the salary of an assistant to Dr. Hooker at Kew Gardens, and for planting shrubs in the neighbourhood of the lake in Victoria Park, in order to extend the facilities for bathing. He regretted that he could not inform the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) where the Parks to which he referred were situated; but had the hon. Member given him Notice of his intention to make the inquiry, he would have taken care to have been furnished with full information on the subject.

MR. ANDERSON was surprised at the statement of the noble Lord. Here was a park which cost the country £1,143

a-year, and the noble Lord confessed he did not know where it was. Then there was another which cost £559, and he never tried to answer the question which had been put to him.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, if the hon. Member noticed the innumerable number of items that were in the list, he would not be surprised at his not being able to give satisfactory answers in regard to everyone of them off-hand.

MR. DILLWYN said, that he had objected to items of increase only where no explanation was offered, and it was on that account he should press his Motion to a division. He complained of the increased expenditure for the Parks, and, though he enjoyed visiting them, he thought the growing expenditure must stop somewhere.

MR. MONK understood that the Serpentine was cleansed last year and paid for, and asked whether the sum now required was for completing the work?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that the money now asked for was for the rest of the Serpentine, which would be cleansed this year.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £90,036, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1876, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."—(Mr. Dillwyn.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 15; Noes 53: Majority 38.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

"That a sum, not exceeding £116,130, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1876, for the Maintenance and Repair of Public Buildings; for providing the necessary supply of Water; for Rents of Houses hired for the temporary accommodation of Public Departments, and Charges attendant thereon."

MR. COWAN, in moving the reduction of the Vote by £500, said, his object was to call attention to a Vote of that amount which he thought should be included for the restoration of St. Giles' Cathedral, Edinburgh. He explained that the cathedral having fallen into such a state of disrepair that it was fit neither for religious services nor for the reception of Her Majesty's Commissioners to the General Assembly, a committee was formed, which carried out a scheme of restoration at a cost of over £4,000. The Committee was at a further expense of £1,500 for fitting up a Royal pew and other alterations, and it was understood that the Government had agreed to pay £1,000, subsequently, however, they reduced it to £500, and he was at a loss to know why they did so. For the purpose of explanation, he would move the reduction of the Vote by the sum of £500.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £115,630, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1876, for the Maintenance and Repair of Public Buildings; for providing the necessary supply of Water; for Rents of Houses hired for the temporary accommodation of Public Departments, and Charges attendant thereon."—(Mr. Cowan.)

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE pointed out that the hon. Member was moving to reduce the Vote in respect of an item which did not this year appear in the Vote.

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was quite competent for the hon. Member to move for a reduction of the Vote; but that, at the same time, the observation of the hon. Member who had just spoken was equally to the point.

MR. COWAN said, he only wished to urge upon the Government that the contribution of £500 was too small, seeing that St. Giles' Cathedral Church contained the pew that had been occupied by the Scottish Kings, and which was still occupied by the Representatives of Royalty at the General Assemblies.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he understood the hon. Member to move that the Vote be reduced by £500, because it was not £500 more. He need not point out that if the hon. Member succeeded in his Motion, he would not advance the object he had in view, as the Treasury would have £500 less, instead of £500 more, to dispose of. The demand made by the hon. Member had been most anxiously considered, not only by his noble Friend, who was most desirous that a further grant should be made, but by the Treasury; and they found when they had to consider the whole question that they had to deal with it in the light of the action of the past Government. His right hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Adam) sent a recommendation in 1874, to the effect that a grant should be made towards the restoration of St. Giles' Cathedral, and in his Memorandum he stated that the sum asked was too high, and that it seemed to him £500 would be a fair and sufficient contribution. That sum had been paid, and as their Predecessors thought it a fair and sufficient contribution, the present Government did not see that they were justified in increasing it. It was right to add that the Crown was in no way responsible for the work which had been carried out. It was undertaken by the Committee, without any notice of the estimated cost, and after the work had been done an application was made to the Government to bear the cost.

Mr. ADAM said, what the Secretary of the Treasury had stated was perfectly correct. The late Government were asked to contribute towards the restoration of St. Giles', the work in connection with which had been most efficiently done by the town council and subscriptions. The matter was brought before him when he was Commissioner of Works, and although he was quite of opinion that, strictly speaking, the Board of Works were not bound in any way to subscribe, still as it appeared that a very great work had been done most efficiently, and at considerable cost; and further, considering that in the cathedral there were Royal pews and pews for the Judges, he thought it would only be fair that the Government should give some subscription, and he therefore prevailed upon the Government to allow this sum, though he must say that, as a good deal of extra money had been spent, if the Treasury could see their way to a further additional subscription, he should not feel in a position to oppose them.

Mr. COWAN said, he would not divide the House, but he really hoped the Government would again look into the matter.

Mr. MONK asked for explanations of the increase of the item for painting and maintaining Westminster Bridge, which was £4,695, against £2,136 last year?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that every three years it was necessary to paint the bridge, and this was the triennial occasion on which the Vote exhibited an increase.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

the world was absolute perfection; but anyone who attended the House during a Morning Sitting, and came down again at a quarter to 9 o'clock to find the House as fresh as if there had been no Morning Sitting, must admit that it would be difficult indeed to improve the ventilation. In answer to the questions of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adam), he begged to state that Mr. Herbert's painting in the Peers' Robing Room would be completed in the course of the summer. With regard to the frescoes, his noble Friend (Lord Hardinge), and that very distinguished artist Mr. Richmond, with Mr. Ward, had been endeavouring to save those works of art from destruction. When the House broke up last Session, it was found that some portions of those frescoes were so utterly obscured that it was feared it would be impossible to restore them. A process was suggested by Mr. Richmond which was of a most simple character, and on his responsibility he allowed it to be tried. Mr. Richmond, with great public spirit, gave up the whole of his valuable time to superintend the work, and he believed the result had been pronounced on all hands an eminent success. With regard to the other frescoes, Lord Hardinge and the gentlemen he had named had undertaken to see if anything could be done to restore them; but he feared that those, especially, in the Committee Lobby were in such a deplorable condition that nothing could be done but to leave them to decay.

MR. ANDERSON asked when the house in Spring Gardens recently occupied by Sir John Lefevre would be vacated?

LORD HENRY LENNOX believed the premises would be given up in October next.

COLONEL BARTELOT called attention to the monstrous charge—£340—for planting the gardens in Parliament Square. He would undertake to have it done for £40 or £50.

LORD HENRY LENNOX had no doubt it might have been done at a cheaper rate; but the question was, would it have been done so well? It would be a great pity not to have those beautiful beds properly planted.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £19,160, to complete the sum for the New Home and Colonial Offices.

MR. WHITWELL inquired when the new offices would be occupied?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that on the 1st of July the Home Secretary would commence his migration from his present offices to the new buildings.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER thought the new buildings overcharged with sculpture not very well executed. He had no hesitation in saying that the new offices would have looked much handsomer without so much ornamentation.

Vote agreed to.

(7.) £12,376, to complete the sum for Sheriff Court Houses, Scotland.

(8.) £11,809, to complete the sum for the National Gallery Enlargement.

(9.) £2,590, to complete the sum for Burlington House.

(10.) £134,000, to complete the sum for Post Office and Inland Revenue Buildings.

(11.) £8,038, to complete the sum for the British Museum Buildings.

MR. SULLIVAN complained of the length of time readers were kept waiting for books in the Reading Room owing to the deficiency in the number of attendants. He had been kept waiting more than an hour for a work, and he found many others who were put to like inconvenience. He was inclined to move the postponement of the Vote until the matter had been inquired into.

MR. GOLDNEY suggested that the space required for the Museum purposes, which was the great difficulty, could be gained if some of the officers had residences elsewhere. It was not necessary that they should live on the Museum premises.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE repeated the complaint made as to the length of time readers were kept waiting for books in the Reading Room, and trusted the Government would look into the question.

CAPTAIN NOLAN complained that Parliamentary Papers were not to be had at the Reading Room until they were a year old.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he had not only in his official capacity, but as one of the Trustees of the British Museum, the pleasure of informing the House that the addition of several attendants in the Reading Room had been sanctioned by the Treasury; but with regard to the proposal to change the place of residence of the officials, he would not offer an opinion, but must refer the matter to his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) as one of the Trustees. The whole question would have been more properly raised on the Vote for the Establishment.

MR. SPENCER WALPOLE said, that, considering the value of the collections, the Trustees believed it essential that official residences should be on the site of the Museum itself, so that responsible persons might be on the spot to render service in case of fire or accident. With regard to the delay in obtaining books, nothing was more important than that the best attention should be given to readers, and that they should get what they wanted within a reasonable time. It appeared upon the last investigation of the matter, that the average time they were kept waiting did not exceed 20 minutes, and, in cases where gentlemen were kept longer, it was possible that delay was occasioned by the fact that they did not give in the proper references.

Vote agreed to.

(12.) £33,980, to complete the sum for County Courts Buildings.

(13.) £8,006, to complete the sum for the Science and Art Department Buildings.

MR. SANDFORD wished for some explanation as to this Vote, on which he observed that there was an increase of 60 per cent as compared with a former Vote for the same purpose?

LORD HENRY LENNOX explained that one great object of the Vote was to provide for the payment of the re-laying of the Mosaic pavement.

MR. DILLWYN said, that since the commencement of the South Kensington Museum, the total expenditure upon the building and its contents had been £1,191,709. He thought it was high time they should have some assurance that this expenditure would come to a stop.

MR. SULLIVAN said, he had to complain that the managers of this Museum were crowding its cellars with valuable works of art, instead of placing them at the disposal and for the inspection of young artists through who would by their only improve them generally. Liverpool towns ought to be which it contained them.

Lord Henry Lennox

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR pointed out that the estimated cost of the Survey Department contained on account of the military pay drawn by the officers and men; it merely showed the civil salaries of the Engineer officers and men of the Royal Engineers employed on the Survey. It was unfair to the Army to allow the military pay of the large force of Royal Engineers to appear in the Army Estimates. There might have been an excuse for a separation of military pay and survey pay when the Survey department was under the War Office; but now that the department had been removed from under the Secretary of State, it was not only just to the Army, but right in a financial point of view, to debit the military pay in this Estimate, and remove it from the War Office. He hoped that in future they would have a more exact statement of the expenditure under this head.

LORD HENRY LENNOX was glad to be able to state that the survey of the southern counties was in a very forward state of progress. With regard to the Survey being carried on by the job, he would mention the suggestion to the gallant officer who presided over it, but of course he could express no opinion of his own upon the subject. As to the question as to how long it would be before it would be completed, everything depended on the amount of money voted for it. In 1871, however, his Predecessor, Mr. Ayrton, calculated that 12 or 13 years must elapse before it was completed. With regard to the question of the hon. and learned Member for Beaumaris (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) he would institute inquiry into the circumstances, and communicate the result to the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. HEYGATE was glad to hear the noble Lord say the Survey was rapidly proceeding, but he had a right to demand from Her Majesty's Government that some little extra speed should be given to its completion. Other parts of the Kingdom besides Sussex were deeply interested in the Surveys being proceeded with rapidly, and if the Government had any money to spare, they could not do better than spend it by increasing the Vote. At the present rate of progress, they might all go to their graves without having seen a Cadastral Survey of many portions of the country. He did not, however, agree with his hon. and gallant Friend near him (Colonel Barttelot) that it would be better to pay those engaged upon it by the acre instead of by the day. It was a most important work, and they should receive good remuneration. He thought the best course to pursue was to leave the Survey in the hands of the able Engineer officers who were now employed on the works. It was a mistake to suppose that in the rural districts the Survey was not regarded as of equal importance and equally appreciated as in mining and manufacturing districts.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR hoped that some reduction would be made in the price of the maps constructed according to the large scale. It cost a very large sum to obtain a complete set of the sheets of a county on the large scale. Indeed, it would be wise to reduce the price of all sheets to the mere cost and charges.

Vote agreed to.

(15.) £6,649, to complete the sum for Harbours, &c. under the Board of Trade.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, there were several harbours on the coast which might be made available as harbours of refuge, as well as those named in the Estimates, and on the improvement of which money might be well expended. Indeed, it was objectionable to allow this large expenditure to be exhibited in the obscure form at present followed. As far as he could ascertain, nearly £6,000,000 had been spent on harbours in the United Kingdom in 27 years, ending in 1867, of which more than five-sixths had been applied to the coasts of England, and only a small fraction to Scotland. The entire expenditure on harbours should be clearly shown in one Vote, instead of allowing portions to be shown in Scotch and Irish Votes. A better control over this important branch of public works would be useful financially, and valuable in effecting better results for our harbours.

Vote agreed to.

(16.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £7,500, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1876, for the Contribution to the Funds for the Establishment and Maintenance of a Fire Brigade in the Metropolis."

MR. SULLIVAN said, he was well aware that a fire brigade was necessary for the protection of Government property, but he wished to know why some contribution was not made towards the fire brigade in Dublin, in which city there was a very large amount of Government property. Last year it was found that the assessment of the penny in the pound, authorized by the Act, was insufficient to pay the expenses, and the result was that the brigade had to be reduced in strength. He had a strong feeling in favour of granting a sum towards the Dublin Fire Brigade, as was very properly done in the case of London, and unless some satisfactory explanation was given, he would move the reduction of the Vote by £6,999.

Motion made, and Question,

"That a sum, not exceeding £501, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1876, for the Contribution to the Funds for the Establishment and Maintenance of a Fire Brigade in the Metropolis,"—(Mr. Sullivan.)

—put, and negatived.

(17.) £195,091, to complete the sum for Rates on Government Property.

MR. SULLIVAN hoped that some explanation would be given of this Vote, in reference to which no explanation was given on the former occasion. He considered some statement was necessary in reference to the promise given some time ago by the Viceroy of Ireland that the rates on the Government establishments should be defrayed. He should be glad to hear what was likely to be done by the Government in reference to the Vote.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, that the sole reason why the contribution by the Government to the local rates had not been paid to the Corporation of the City of Dublin was because the necessary calculations, which were in progress, had not yet been made. It must be understood that it took a long time to do that, but as soon as the sum payable had been ascertained, it would be handed over to the local authorities. The most important of the in other parts of the count agreed upon.

In reply to Mr. SHAW L. THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that in future to be paid under this arrangement appear upon the Estimates to be paid would vary according to the amount of the rates levied.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE wished to be informed whether the arrangement had been come to for rating the Post Office?

MR. W. H. SMITH, in as soon as the inquiry was made and the calculation was made in the country would be paid for, and the fullest would be given on the subject.

MR. SULLIVAN asked whether a sum to be paid to the City would be forthcoming this year, so, whether it would be have a Supplementary Estimate in as soon as the calculation was settled?

MR. MORGAN LLOYD asked whether it should be obliged to pay as any other description of property should be liable; had been arrived at by Government property would be rates would be calculated on basis, and Votes taken for The hon. Member for Louth whether there would be a Supplementary Estimate for Ireland, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer) whether other Estimate would be taken beyond the sum named as complete the Vote.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in reply, said, that he lay down any rule by which property should be liable; had been arrived at by Government property would be rates would be calculated on basis, and Votes taken for The hon. Member for Louth whether there would be a Supplementary Estimate for Ireland, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer) whether other Estimate would be taken beyond the sum named as complete the Vote.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOCK said, it was desirable that the Government explain upon what principle property had been exempted from the same proportion of rates as other descriptions of house property. A large establishment, whether a low, while small houses were high. What he wished to know was the basis on which the Government calculated in reference to the property. He hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer would state to the Committee the principle upon which large establishments such as the Dockyards were rated.

MR. PELL said, he observed in the Estimate that no contribution was to be expected from telegraphic lines which were being constructed by the Government. Upon what principle would they be rated?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE suggested that a Return of the cases already determined upon should be laid upon the Table.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not answer off-hand the questions which had been put to him by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Sir William Harcourt), but he imagined the proper principle upon which to calculate would be first to ascertain what similar private property was rated at? There were varieties of matters to be taken into consideration. He would undertake to lay on the Table a Return to meet the views of the hon. Member for Reading, as it seemed the most convenient course to pursue.

MR. MUNDELLA wished to know on what principle the Royal Palaces were rated. A contribution of £520 to the rates was hardly a fair percentage of the amount at which those buildings should be rated to the poor.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, no rates were charged on the Palaces in the actual occupation of the Sovereign.

Vote agreed to.

(18.) £2,901, to complete the sum for the Wellington Monument.

MR. ADAM wished to know when it was likely the Monument would be completed?

SIR GEORGE BOWYER inquired to whom the completion of the work had been entrusted since the death of Mr. Stevens?

MR. GOLDNEY complained that an entire generation should have been allowed to pass away before the completion of the Monument. The Committee was entitled to ask if the sum now asked for would be sufficient to complete the work, who had the control of it, and if the amount was not sufficient, what was likely to be its ultimate cost? The original Estimate had been £14,000.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that when he succeeded to office in the early part of last year very little progress had for a long time been made with the Monument, although it had been 22 years in hand. Indeed, it seemed likely that 22 years more might elapse before it was finished. This was not owing to any negligence on the part of his Predecessors, but was entirely owing to the long and deplorable illness of the lamented sculptor, Mr. Stevens, who recently died. At that time he asked the Committee to accept a promise from him that he would consider carefully what course ought to be taken, and that if he found the progress made was not likely to be satisfactory he would propose to place the work in other hands. He was now in a position to make a statement of a gratifying character. The figure of the Duke of Wellington had been cast, and was merely awaiting the finishing of the bronze. One of the large side groups was in course of casting, and there now remained in the studio of Mr. Stevens the other large side group, and three small pieces, which, according to a report he had received at the beginning of the present month from two gentlemen who, at his request, had inspected them, were practically finished. In three weeks from the date of that report every part of the Wellington Monument was expected to be in the hands of Mr. Young, the founder, to whom the delay which had occurred was not in the least attributable. Therefore, he confidently appealed to the Committee to say whether he had not justified the latitude which had been allowed him last year, inasmuch as during the last 12 months all that the sculptor was required to do had been done, and it only remained for the founder to make the necessary castings. In answer to the hon. Member for Chippenham (Mr. Goldney), he might say that that sum of money would finally exhaust the payments for that work. As far as Mr. Young could tell, before the end of the present year every part of the Wellington Monument would be cast and placed in St. Paul's Cathedral. It would be seen that he had taken a large sum in this year's Estimate for that work; but he thought the Committee would prefer that that large sum should appear in the Estimates if he could at the same time assure them that the money voted would produce such substantial results.

Vote agreed to.

(19.) £66,700, to complete the sum for the Natural History Museum.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, this was a matter in which he took a deep interest, inasmuch as when the Natural History Museum was completed, he expected to see the Natural History Collection at present in the British Museum, which was painfully overcrowded, removed to the new institution, and room thus made for the exhibition of many most interesting specimens of ancient art, especially as regarded sculpture, which were now stowed away in the cellars of the British Museum. Some of the finest monuments were now stored in places more fit for keeping casks of beer in than works of art. The original Estimate for the Natural History Museum was £350,000; the revised Estimate was £395,000. What the re-revised Estimate would be he could not tell. At the present rate of progress, it would take three years to complete the building, and he would be glad if the First Commissioner of Works could give them some satisfactory assurance on that point.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER suggested that the buildings should be high ones, in order to afford ample accommodation to their collections without the necessity of incurring heavy expenses in the purchase of large sites.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, there had been no unnecessary delay. He thought they might safely say that it would take two years from the present time for the completion of the building; but some additional time would afterwards be required for the removal of the collection. During the last year the work had gone on with great spirit, and he was anxious that increased accommodation should as soon as practicable be given to the British Museum. He proposed to take a Vote for £80,000 this year, which would make up £180,000; but after that a further expense would be entailed in removing the collection and preparing the building for its reception.

Vote agreed to.

(20.) £5,580, to complete the sum for the Metropolitan Police Courts.

(21.) £63,400, to complete the sum for the New Courts of Justice and Offices,

MR. GREGORY urged the expediency of completing those buildings as soon as possible, adding that if their construction was to proceed only at the rate of expenditure named in the Vote, it would take seven years according to the Estimate to finish them—a delay, which taking the rate of interest which had to be paid meantime, and the inconvenience to the legal profession, he strongly deprecated.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he was in no way responsible for the delay which had occurred in the construction of the new Law Courts. The works certainly had not made as much progress as he could have wished. He had communicated with the contractors (Messrs. Bull) on the subject, and they had stated that the magnitude of the undertaking and the necessity of fixing machinery of a certain kind, which he knew from other quarters was of a first-class character, had taken up a great deal of time. In consequence, he might add, of the remarks which he had made on a former occasion, extra hands had been put on, and he could assure his hon. Friend that he would keep a watchful eye upon the progress of the building.

SIR HENRY JAMES inquired whether any contract had been entered into which in any way limited the time at which the new Courts of Justice were to be finally completed?

MR. GOLDNEY said, we had in London many examples of large and substantial buildings which had been erected with great rapidity, and referred, as an example, to Covent Garden Theatre, which, though built in seven months, had, as he was informed, not a single structural defect.

LORD HENRY LENNOX was certain a contract had been entered into to complete the work in a specified time—seven years, he believed, from the commencement of the works. Six years had elapsed between the time of the purchase of the site and the completion of the contract, and in fact the progress made had only been a progress extending over about 10 months, as the foundation stone, it should be remembered, was laid less than a year ago.

Vote agreed to.

(22.) £450, to complete the sum for Ramsgate Harbour.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, the harbour at Ramsgate was an entire failure as a harbour of refuge, and he thought it was a mistake of the Board of Trade to take it over from the Commissioners.

SIR CHARLES ADDERLEY said, that the charge for the maintenance of the harbour had been placed by Parliament on the Consolidated Fund. There had been a considerable decrease in its expenses, and it was a harbour of refuge though not successful from a commercial point of view. He would also say that passing tolls had been abolished, which formerly produced an annual revenue of £18,000 for the harbour.

Vote agreed to.

(23.) £8,400, to complete the sum for the New Palace at Westminster, Acquisition of Lands and Embankments.

(24.) £147,711, to complete the sum for Public Buildings in Ireland.

(25.) £14,510, to complete the sum for Lighthouses Abroad.

BISHOPRIC OF SAINT ALBANS BILL.

(Mr. Secretary Cross, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir Henry Selwyn-Ibbetson).

[BILL 95.] CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Clause 8 (Appointment of Bishop of Saint Alban's by Her Majesty.)

MR. MONK, in moving, as an Amendment, to omit the first line of the clause, said, that the object of his Amendment was to ensure the continuance of the mode of appointment of the Bishop laid down in the Bill after the creation of a dean and chapter of St. Albans — namely, by letters patent direct from the Crown in lieu of the cumbrous machinery of the congé d'elire and letters missive, which had given rise to much scandal and inconvenience to the Church. He disclaimed any intention of aiming a blow at deans and chapters by his Amendment. His object was rather to save them from being placed in the humiliating position of having to elect a Bishop, of whom they might not approve, with the alternative of a præmunire staring them in the face. The Government had entirely given up the principle of election by congé d'elire in the St. Albans Bill by recurring to the mode of appointment of Bishops which existed in England in the reign of Edward VI., and in Ireland from the second year of the reign of Elizabeth to the disestablishment of the Irish Church. Under the Irish Act of 2 Elizabeth, c. 4, all Archbishoprics and Bishoprics were made donative, and so continued after the union of the Church of England and Ireland. There was no election, no confirmation, the appointment being absolute by letters patent, on the authority of which the consecration took place. The 25 Henry VIII., c. 20, prescribed the manner in which Bishops should be elected, presented, invested, and consecrated within the King's dominions; the first step on the avoidance of a see was the congé d'elire, accompanied by letters missive containing the name of the appointee, then the form of election by the dean and chapter, then the certification of the election to the King, and after the oath of fealty had been taken, the King signified the same to the Archbishop of the Province, requiring him to confirm the said election, and to invest and consecrate the person so elected to the office to which he had been elected. Section 4 enacted that if the dean and chapter delayed the election of the person named in the letters missive above 12 days after receiving the same, the King might appoint whom he pleased by Letters Patent under the Great Seal. Section 7 enacted that if the dean and chapter did not elect and signify the same within 20 days they should suffer the penalties of the statutes of provisors and præmunire. By 1 Edward VI., c. 2, all Bishoprics were made donative in this country. That Act recited with much disapprobation the mock election under congé d'elire and letters missive, stigmatizing the proceedings as—

“colours, shadows, and pretences, serving to no purpose, but derogatory and prejudicial to the King's Prerogative, to whom alone appertaineth the collation and gift of all Bishoprics in England and Ireland.”

That Act was repealed by 1 Philip & Mary, c. 8, as also was 25 Henry VIII., c. 20, but the latter Act was re-enacted by 1 Elizabeth, c. 1. So the law remained in England to this day. The House would observe that the dean and chapter were compelled under pains and penalties of the heaviest nature to elect the person named in the letters missive. In the case of Dr. Hampden, late Bishop of Hereford, the election was contested in the chapter by the late Dean Merewether, but he was out-voted, and the election took place. Subsequently, proceedings were taken to prevent the confirmation of the election at Bow Church on the 11th of January, 1848, when certain opposers appeared by counsel and claimed to be heard. After hearing arguments, the Vicar General overruled the objections, declared that the opposers could not be heard, and pronounced all opposers contumacious for not appearing, at the same time directing the apparitor to call upon all persons to "come forward and make their objections in due form of law, and they shall be heard." On an application to the Court of King's Bench for a mandamus to compel the Archbishop to hear the opposers, the Court was equally divided in opinion, so that the mandamus was not granted. But the scandal to the Church arising from such a proceeding was very great. Nor was that a single instance. A like scandal occurred at the confirmation of Dr. Lee as Bishop of Manchester, and of Dr. Temple as Bishop of Exeter. The Court of King's Bench having ruled that the election of a Bishop by a dean and chapter was a pure matter of form and a ministerial act only, the religious service ought not to be mixed up with it; while the invocation of the Holy Spirit to guide the chapter in their choice of a Bishop, with the penalties of præmunire staring them in the face if they exercised a free choice in the matter, was little short of blasphemy. So with respect to the confirmation also. In a debate in the House of Lords in 1848, Lord Denman, the Chief Justice of the King's Bench, said—

"An Amendment of the 25th Henry VIII., by substituting this simple process (the conferring upon the Crown the direct appointment of bishops) for the cumbrous machinery of congé d'élire and lettre missive, would be a great improvement of the law, and would avoid the scandal of similar questions arising in Westminster Hall for the future."—[3 Hansard, xcvi. 647.]

The venerable and learned Bishop Thirlwall expressed his concurrence, and said he believed the time had arrived, and circumstances had arisen, when it was absolutely necessary that some change or other should be made in the law. Bishop Phillpotts also thought that, so far as the election of Bishops by deans and chapters was concerned, the statute of Henry VIII. was unmixed tyranny. Under those circumstances, he (Mr. Monk) had brought in a Bill last Session to abolish the congé d'élire, but he had no opportunity of moving the second reading. He was glad to find the Government strengthening his hands, by proposing in that Bill to dispense with the congé d'élire in the first instance, and thereby abandoning the principle of a mock election. The object he had in view was to make that abandonment permanent, and he appealed to the House not to leave the shadow when they had taken away the substance. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Amendment.

MR. FORSYTH seconded the Amendment, as he disapproved of fictions being kept up in the Church, when in most other instances they had been abolished. A real congé d'élire had been given by King John, and from that time until the reign of Henry VIII. there had been no interference on the part of the Crown with the election of a Bishop. He could not see what possible good purpose it could serve to keep up the present fiction of the congé d'élire addressed to a dean and chapter who must elect a particular person under the terrors of a præmunire, and who went through the form of a prayer to the Almighty to direct their choice. The case of Dr. Hampden had given rise to a great scandal, and he hoped there would not be a repetition of it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 35, to leave out from the words "So long," to the words "Saint Albans," and insert the words "After (the foundation of the new Bishopric of Saint Albans as aforesaid,)—(Mr. Monk),"

—instead thereof.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE trusted the Home Secretary would not accept the Amendment. It was a broad question, and ought not to be raised on a narrow issue in a thin House. If the system was to be altered let it be altered for the whole Church, if the Church were inclined to give its assent to the change; but he did not think the whole Church would assent to the alteration of the system. The arrangement in this case was of a provisional character. If the Amendment were adopted, they would open delicate and burning questions, and, at the same time, not render the Bill in any degree more acceptable by making so sweeping a change on so small a portion.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS opposed the Amendment, on the ground that there were at present no dean and chapter of St. Albans, nor did the Bill make provision for creating them. The general question—how Bishops ought to be appointed—was a very proper one to raise, but this was not the occasion for raising it. He was aware that the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) had introduced a measure last Session to change the mode in which Bishops should be elected. This Bill, however, was framed on a different principle, and he thought the hon. Member ought to re-introduce his Bill, in order that the general principle should be discussed. He hoped the House would leave the Bill as it stood.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was quite ready to recognize the right of the flock in the choice of their chief pastor; but in no sense did the dean and chapter represent the rights of the flock. What they did represent was the rights of the clergy. Under this Bill the Bishop would be nominated by the Crown, without the clergy having any voice in the matter; but in the best days of the Church of England—namely, in the reign of Edward VI., even the form of a congé d'elire was dispensed with. He did not think that there was any likelihood of a dean and chapter being appointed in their time, so that there would be no fear of the congé d'elire being resorted to. The hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk), therefore, would get what he wanted, a non-congé d'elire Bishop; and he (Sir William Harcourt) hoped that he would not divide the House.

Clause 11 (Sale by Commissioners of Danbury.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, the object of the clause was to the effect that the Commissioners should provide in the county of Surrey a suitable episcopal residence for the Bishop of Surrey. He objected to the question being prejudged, in the sense of a Parliamentary enactment that a Bishop was to live away from his See town. Perhaps in the present case it would be better that he should live in Surrey; but it was not right to sanction a violation of principle by statute. He would move that the words "in the county of Surrey" be omitted.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 36, to leave out the words "in the county of Surrey." — (Mr. Beresford Hope.)

MR. ASSHETON CROSS opposed the Amendment. The Bishop of Rochester had never resided in the Cathedral town, and the new Bishopric, it should be remembered, was founded practically for the benefit of South London, and it was therefore considered desirable that the Bishop's residence should be in the county of Surrey.

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Bill to be read the third time upon Monday next.

SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS BILL.

(Mr. Selater-Booth, Mr. Clare Read.)

[BILL 168.] CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

Clause 5 (Prohibition of the sale of articles of food and of drugs not of the proper nature, substance, and quality. Exceptions.)

MR. SANDFORD moved, as an Amendment, at end of clause to add the following words:—

"And be it further provided that in case a person be fined for the sale of an article of food or drug to the prejudice of a purchaser as aforesaid, he shall, if he sold such article without knowing it to be of a different nature, substance, or quality from that demanded, and in the condition in which it was supplied to him by the dealer from whom he had received it, have right of action against such dealer, and be entitled to recover from him the amount of penalty and costs to which he had been subjected."

MR. MUNDELLA said, he could not but express his surprise at the hon. Gentleman now moving to re-insert the word "knowingly" in the Bill, from which it had been struck out on a former night. The effect of the Amendment would be to subject the wholesale dealer to vexatious prosecutions and costs, in a matter of which he might not have had any knowledge when he was selling the article. He (Mr. Mundella) had no interest in the matter but that of justice; and if the word "knowingly" were inserted in the Bill, he would tell the hon. Gentleman that before long the Bill must be amended, or another Sale of Food and Drugs Bill be brought in.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, in supporting the Amendment, said, there was difficulty in getting at the wholesale dealer, and that the Amendment was considered necessary.

Amendment agreed to; Words added.

On the Motion of Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, Clause further amended, by providing that no person engaged in any trade or business locally connected with the sale of food or drugs should be appointed an analyst under the Act.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 13 (Provision for dealing with the sample when purchased).

DR. C. CAMERON proposed to amend the clause by the insertion of words providing that the analyst should certify that the sample retained by the purchaser was of the same quality as that which he reported on.

Amendment proposed,

In page 5, line 17, after the word "parts," to insert the words "after it shall have been marked and sealed by the analyst."—(Dr. Cameron.)

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH objected to the Amendment as one likely to create confusion.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The House divided:—Ayes 17; Noes 53: Majority 36.

Amendment proposed,

In page 7, line 6, to leave out from the word "analysis," to the end of the Clause, and insert the words "and such officer may be required to attend to give evidence at the hearing of the case, and the expenses of such examination, analysis, and attendance shall be deemed part of the expenses of executing this Act, unless the justices order the same to be paid by the complainant or the defendant."—(Dr. Cameron.)

Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Bill to be read the third time upon Monday next.

TURNPIKE ROADS (SOUTH WALES) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH, Bill for the further amendment of the Laws relating to Turnpike Roads in South Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. SCLATER-BOOTH and Mr. CLARE READ.

ARMY—DEATH OF A SOLDIER FROM ALCOHOL—CARLOW.

QUESTION.

MR. KAVANAGH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the death of Richard Dickinson, a trooper in the 4th Dragoon Guards, who is reported in the papers to have died on Tuesday morning last from injuries received while assisting to extinguish a fire in the town of Carlow; and, if so, whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the circumstances attending his death?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, on the 2nd of May, at night, a fire broke out in the town of Carlow. A detachment of the 4th Dragoon Guards attended with the garrison engine and worked hard in extinguishing it. In a neighbouring house the men were supplied with whisky, without the knowledge of the officer commanding, and apparently one of them, Dickinson by name, drank to excess. Before morning he was taken violently ill, and he died early on the 4th of May. There was no suspicion of violence; but there was reason to suppose that the whisky had been drugged for trade purposes to the extent of becoming poisonous, as two other men were taken ill and recovered after vomiting. The deceased's stomach and its contents were analyzed by the proper officer, but nothing was found beyond alcohol. A coroner's jury thereupon returned a verdict of "Death by congestion of the brain, produced by an overdose of alcohol."

INDIA—CHINA AND KASHGAR.

QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Indian Government have any information as to the Chinese attack on the Dominions of the Amir of Kashgar other than that which has appeared in the newspapers; and, whether any instructions have been sent to the British Minister at Peking upon the subject?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, we received two Despatches from India, dated the 5th of February and the 15th of March respectively, enclosing letters from Mr. Shaw, the officer on special duty at Kashgar. In the first letter, he states his belief that there appears to be no imminent apprehension of a Chinese invasion; and, in the second, he says that it is currently reported that certain Tungani chiefs have sent to the Amir asking for assistance against the Chinese.

We have received no confirmation of these rumours. In reply to the second part of the Question, I find, upon inquiry at the Foreign Office, that no information relating to a Chinese attack upon the Amir's dominions has been received from Peking, and no instructions have been sent to the British Minister there.

METROPOLIS—CAB FARES.

QUESTION.

SIR PATRICK O'BRIEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will recommend to the Police Commissioners the propriety of authorizing some increase of the fares for cabs hired between the hours of midnight and 6 of the clock a.m.

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that, on inquiry, he had found the demand for cabs during the night hours had very much diminished since the passing of the Licensing Act of 1874, and that he had no intention at present of recommending an increase of the fares.

NAVY—DOCKYARD SERVANTS—THE REGULATIONS.—QUESTION.

MR. GORST asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, Whether it is true that men employed in Her Majesty's Dockyards are forbidden to hold parochial offices, even when the duties of such offices do not interfere with their work in the yard; and, if so, what is the reason for subjecting men to this disability?

MR. HUNT: Sir, the Dockyard Regulations, Art. 31, say—

"No person is to hold any parochial office or to have any occupation which may call off his attention from his duty, and thereby cause irregularity of attendance."

Application has to be made to the Admiralty in the case of a man employed in the Dockyard wishing to take a parochial office, and permission is granted or refused according to whether the condition of the above regulation is likely to be complied with or not.

RUSSIA AND JAPAN—ISLAND OF SAGHALIEN.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he can inform the House if any consideration has been paid by Russia to Japan for the recent cession to Russia by Japan of her rights in the Island of Saghalien?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the negotiations between Russia and Japan in regard to Saghalien have been carried on at St. Petersburg between the Japanese Minister and the Russian Government; and the Japanese Minister has informed Lord Augustus Loftus that a Convention was signed on the 7th instant ceding the southern portion of Saghalien to Russia in exchange for the Kurile Islands—18 in number—lying to the north-east of Yeso. The Russians are already in possession of the northern part of Saghalien.

INDIA—CIVIL SERVANTS OF THE NORTH-WEST PROVINCES.

QUESTION.

MR. LOWE asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether, as it appears by a Despatch which has been laid upon the Table of the House, that the Indian Government admits that it has broken its engagement with the civilians of the North-west Provinces, and that the Indian Government decline to apply any efficient remedy to the injury which it has thus inflicted, the Secretary of State for India will take speedy and efficient measures for redressing the wrong committed by the Government of India?

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: Sir, before I answer the Question of the right hon. Gentleman, perhaps I may be permitted to point out—first, that he has assumed that the Indian Government has not only broken its engagement, but also admits having done so. Now, Sir, I cannot allow that assumption to pass without contradiction. The only contract or engagement existing between the Secretary of State and the Government of India on the one hand, and the Indian Civil Service on the other, is the Indian Civil Service Act of 1861, which Act does not apply to appointments in the non-regulation Provinces. The present complaint is, however, exclusively directed to the appointments made in the non-regulation Provinces. The civilians of the North-west Provinces complain to the Government of India, that certain rules promulgated by Lord Dalhousie, affirmed by the Secretary of State in 1864, and approved of by subsequent Governments, for regulating the proportions of civil servants to be employed in the non-regulation Provinces have not been carried out, and that in consequence their promotion has been retarded. The Government of India admit that this contention is, in the main, borne out by facts, though the results of which they complain have been brought about by causes which unavoidably led to them in former years, and which are no longer in operation. They propose the following remedy:—

“We intend, therefore, to arrange with the different Administrations a systematic rule of procedure, whereby the preferential claims of civilians shall be brought forward and considered by the Government of India whenever an office falls vacant for which civilians are eligible, and to which no other officer has his superior claim by reason of seniority, local standing, or special qualifications. We think that this course ought to be followed, not only in the non-regulation Provinces, but also in appointing to the chief offices in those special departments of Government which are mainly administrative. And in taking these measures we shall be careful that the rights of individuals, as well as the interests of the public service, are upon no occasion overlooked or postponed to minor considerations.”

The Duke of Argyll expressed his strong approval, in which the present Secretary of State concurs, of these instructions, which are now being carried out. The Marquess of Salisbury has no reason to believe that these remedies will prove inadequate, and until he has received proof of their insufficiency, he does not propose to take any special action.

MR. LOWE gave Notice that, on going into Committee of Supply, he would call attention to the subject, and move a Resolution.

PRISON REGULATIONS—HAIR CUTTING.—QUESTION.

MR. MUNTZ asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the case of George Winterborne, of Culham, who was convicted on the 17th April before the Oxfordshire magistrates at the Bullington Petty Sessions, and fined for having in his possession three plated cups which were not of standard measure, and on conviction he sent to his house about five miles distant for the money, which was paid within three hours, but in the interval his hair and beard were cut off preparatory to his being dressed in a prison suit; and whether there is any regulation or law to justify such conduct on part of the authorities?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS: Sir, I shall be happy to give the hon. Member any information in my power in regard to this matter. I have made inquiries into this case, and I find by the prison rules of Oxford Castle it is provided, first, that the gaoler should see that all prisoners are shaved at least once a-week; secondly, that the hair of any female prisoner shall not be cut without her consent, except it is rendered necessary by illness or dirt. The hair of male prisoners is only to be cut so far as is necessary for health and cleanliness. A letter which I have received from the clerk to the visiting justices states that this man was admitted to the prison about a quarter past 1, on the 17th April, for non-payment of a fine of £2, and that when he arrived his hair was in a state which required cutting. He had no beard, and therefore that could not be cut, but he did grow whiskers continuously under his chin. It so happened, being Saturday afternoon, that the prison barber came on his rounds shortly after 2 o'clock, and Winterborne's hair was, with his consent, cut, and with no greater closeness than if he had entered a barber's shop. The hair under the chin was also shaved.

THE SUNDAY ACT—THE BRIGHTON AQUARIUM CASE.—QUESTION.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he has had his attention directed to the opening of the Zoological Gardens, the Botanic Gardens, the Horticultural Gardens, and other places of public resort on Sundays; and, whether such opening is contrary to the provisions of the Act 21 Geo. 3, under which the Brighton Aquarium has recently been closed; and, if so, whether he will take the necessary steps to secure uniform compliance with the Law?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that his attention had not been specially directed to the opening of the places of resort mentioned in the Question of the hon. Member. He did not quite know what other places of public resort the hon. Member referred to; but if he alluded to Kensington Gardens, his (Mr. Cross's) attention had been called to the great assemblage who enjoyed themselves there yesterday, and he was exceedingly glad to see them there. As to the latter part of the Question, it was impossible for him to state what might be the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench, or any other Court, as to the state of facts with which he was not thoroughly informed. But, as far as he could obtain any information on the matter, he had no reason to believe that the judgment in the case of the Brighton Aquarium would be the same as in that of the Zoological, the Botanic, or the Horticultural Gardens, because he was advised that they stood on a different footing. Therefore, he had no intention whatever to interfere in the matter.

METROPOLIS—THE THAMES EMBANKMENT—THE NATIONAL OPERA HOUSE.—QUESTION.

COLONEL BERESFORD asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, If it be true that on a representation having been made by Mr. Mapleson of his inability to purchase two houses in Cannon Row, Westminster, the Metropolitan Board of Works allowed him to advance his building frontage for the new National Opera House to within about thirty feet of the roadway on the Embankment, thereby giving him, after allowing for a twenty feet road on each side of the building, a net additional area of nearly nine thousand feet; and, if so, what money payment was, or is to be made by Mr. Mapleson or by those whom he represents, for such additional ground and accommodation?

SIR JAMES HOGG: Sir, in answer to the hon. Gentleman, I beg leave to inform him that it is perfectly true, in consequence of his inability to arrange for the purchase of the two houses mentioned in the Question, Mr. Mapleson did represent to the Metropolitan Board of Works that, if he had not permission to advance his building frontage for the new National Opera House beyond the line of frontage originally arranged by the Metropolitan Board of Works, he would be compelled to place the building sideways, which would mar the effect which would be produced by an approach and entrance fronting the Embankment. As an inducement to the Metropolitan Board of Works to allow him to advance the frontage an average distance of 75 feet, he proposed to give up sufficient land to make roadways upon each side of the Opera House, and these roadways the Board have required to be of a width of 20 feet. The building will, therefore, be isolated from adjacent buildings, which will be in accordance with the wishes of the Lord Chamberlain, and is most desirable in the event of fire for a building of this description. So far from Mr. Mapleson having gained by the exchange, he gives up 11,920 feet and receives 11,560 feet, thus ceding 360 square feet; and, therefore, the Metropolitan Board of Works have not required him to make any money payment, and do not intend to do so. I should add that the consent of the Metropolitan Board of Works to the arrangement is dependent upon that of the First Commissioner of Her Majesty's Works being obtained.

ARMY—THE GALWAY MILITIA.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked the Secretary of State for War, If he intends to postpone the training of the Galway Militia in consequence of the present prevalence of small-pox in that county?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, the preliminary drill and training of the Galway Militia, which was to have commenced on the 3rd of May, has been postponed until further orders, in consequence of the prevalence of small-pox in the county. A further Report will be furnished by the authorities in Ireland, on which, with their advice, it will be determined whether or not the training for the present year should be dispensed with altogether.

ARMY—STAFF SERGEANTS OF MILITIA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL NAGHTEN asked the Secretary of State for War, If he will increase the pay and allowances of the staff sergeants of the Militia under the old system to that of the new; and, if he will inform the House when the Militia Law Consolidation and Amendment Bill will be in the hands of Members?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Sir, no pledge can be given as to the increase of pay and allowances to the permanent staff sergeants under the old system. The Militia Law Consolidation and Amendment Bill, which is being carefully revised, will probably be in the hands of Members before Thursday, the day for which it now stands.

THE PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) BILL—SUSPENSION OF THE STANDING ORDERS BY THE LORDS.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN NOLAN asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the Resolution to suspend the Standing Orders on the 14th in the other House of Parliament for the purpose of passing three stages of the Peace Preservation Act in a single sitting was carried with the concurrence of Her Majesty's Government; and, if it is intended that such a Resolution should form a precedent for the conduct of future legislation?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, there can be no doubt that the Motion for the suspension of the Standing Orders in the other House with respect to the measure referred to by the hon. and gallant Officer was made with the concurrence of Her Majesty's Government by my noble Friend the President of the Council. It will swell the number of precedents of similar proceedings, but it is a precedent on the authority of which it is not at all necessary to rest, because there are numerous precedents of the same kind and even of recent occurrence. There was, for instance, the Cattle Disease Bill in 1866, when the Standing Orders were suspended, and the same process was followed in the House of Lords. There was also the Sugar Duties Bill of 1867. I may also remark that when the Peace Preservation Act was passed by the House of Lords in 1870, the Standing Orders were suspended in a similar manner to that adopted in the present case, and with the same results. I need not remind the House that it is absolutely necessary that this Bill should become law before the 1st of June.

FOREIGN OFFICE—ALLEGED ROBBERY OF A QUEEN'S MESSENGER.

QUESTION.

MR. OWEN LEWIS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If his attention has been called to a statement which appeared in the newspapers last week, that a Queen's Messenger, on his way from Berlin with important despatches, fell asleep in the railway carriage, and on awaking found that he had been robbed by a Prussian officer of certain papers and reports, and if he can inform the House if the statement is correct?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, I apprehend the foundation for the statement alluded to by the hon. Member is only this—In September last a messenger who was travelling between Berlin and Brussels was robbed during the night of a bag containing money, papers, and other articles. There were no Despatches or letters belonging to Her Majesty's Government in the bag. There is not the slightest foundation for ascribing the robbery to a Prussian officer.

FRANCE AND GERMANY.—REPRESENTATION OF HER MAJESTY'S GOVERNMENT.—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I rise, Sir, to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, of which I have given him private Notice, and in doing so I only wish to explain that I have not the slightest wish to embarrass the Government—I ask the Question simply in order to give the right hon. Gentleman the opportunity of offering some information to the House, as far as he thinks it consistent with his duty to do so, on a subject of the very highest importance, and on which naturally very great interest has been felt throughout the country—namely, Whether Her Majesty's Government have advised Her Majesty to make any representation to the Governments of France and Germany on the subject of the relations existing between those States; if so, whether they have any objection to state to the House the nature of such representation and of the replies which have been received; and, whether the Correspondence can be laid upon the Table of the House?

MR. DISRAELI: It is, Sir, a fact that Her Majesty's Government advised Her Majesty to make a representation to the Government of the German Emperor respecting the existing relations between Germany and France. The nature of that representation was to correct misconceptions and to insure peace. And to that representation we have received a satisfactory reply. With regard to placing the Papers at present on the Table of the House, I think it would not be for the public convenience that it should be done.

VIVISECTION—A ROYAL COMMISSION. QUESTION.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Government intend to advise Her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the subject of Vivisection with a view to legislation?

MR. ASSHETON CROSS, in reply, said, that there were at present two Bills before Parliament relating to the subject involved in the Question. It was a subject about which considerable anxiety was felt and as to which he ventured to say that very little was known by a great many Members of that House. Therefore, it was the intention of the Government to issue a small Royal Commission to make inquiries into that matter, in order that they might have full information before they attempted to legislate on the subject. Under those circumstances he would suggest that the right hon. Gentleman opposite should allow his Bill to stand over until the inquiry was completed.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, that, after the announcement just made by the Home Secretary, he would move on Friday that the Order for the Second Reading of the Bill he had introduced be discharged.

CAPE COLONY—DISTURBANCES IN GRIQUALAND.—QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY,

MR. J. LOWTHER said: Sir, I am sorry to say that a slight disturbance did occur in Griqualand West. The circumstances were these—An Ordinance of the Cape Government of the date of 1853, which is in operation in the Province prohibits the sale or transfer of arms or ammunition among private persons without a permit being first obtained from the Government. In consequence of it being discovered that this ordinance was being systematically evaded, proceedings were instituted against a dealer, who was convicted and fined £50, with an alternative of three months' imprisonment in default of payment. The fine not being paid, the defendant was arrested, which resulted in a threatening attitude being assumed by the diggers, who largely outnumbered the small local police force at the disposal of the authorities. The affair was however, eventually arranged by a cheque being handed in for the amount of the fine, it being understood that it would not be made use of until after an opportunity had been offered of a review of the case by way of appeal in the ordinary course. No troops have been sent, not, as I have heard it stated in some quarters, on account of any difficulties attending their transport, but because in the opinion of Sir Henry Barkly there was no necessity for their despatch.

RAILWAY COMMUNICATION IN THE EAST—ASIATIC RAILWAYS—
BELOOCHISTAN AND PERSIA.

QUESTION.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked, Whether the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had received any information with reference to an alleged guarantee by the Governments of Austria, Germany, and Russia for the construction of a line of railway between Tiflis to some point on the frontier of Hindostan?

MR. BOURKE: Sir, the Question asked me has nothing to do with that of which my hon. Friend has given me Notice; but I have no difficulty in informing him that we have heard that a concession has been granted to a company to make a short line in the direction of Joulfa on the Persian frontier. As to a railroad through Beloochistan, Her Majesty's Government have no information, and if any of the friends of the hon. Gentleman are thinking of investing in such railway I would strongly advise them not to do so.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—
MORNING SITTING. — OBSERVATIONS.

MR. DISRAELI: I propose, Sir, should the debate on the Public Works Loan Acts Amendment Bill conclude to-night to ask permission of the House to have a Morning Sitting to-morrow. [Several hon. MEMBERS: What for?] The Public Health Bill is the first Business I should like to take, and the next the Land Titles and Transfer Bill.

PARLIAMENT—THE DERBY DAY.

QUESTION.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would inform us whether he has had time to make up his mind as to whether he proposes to move that the House should adjourn over the Derby Day; if so, when will he do so?

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, I have just placed a Notice on the Paper that it is my intention to move that the House at its rising to-morrow should adjourn until Thursday.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: At what time?

MR. DISRAELI: The Motion will be made at Two o'clock.

PUBLIC WORKS LOAN ACTS AMEND-MENT BILL.—[BILL 53.]

(Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. William Henry Smith.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading, read.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER, in rising to move that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that although he had already explained its general object to the House he could not help—looking at the Amendment of which Notice had been given by the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), and the rumours which were afloat as to the great interest which was taken in that Amendment—feeling some uneasiness lest, in a discussion which might turn out to be something between a Social Science discussion and a great Party fight, the provisions of the measure itself might be lost sight of. He was therefore anxious to make a few remarks with respect to it, and at the outset to take the opportunity of correcting a statement which he made on its introduction, as to the amount of the deficiency in the case of advances made from time to time by way of loans. He then said that since the commencement of the system some £70,000,000 had been advanced, and £67,000,000 only repaid; he found, however, from a Return which had since been made that the figures were somewhat different. The fact was, that a number of advances which were originally made as advances were afterwards found to have been intended as grants, the net result being that the whole amount advanced since the beginning of the system was £67,000,000, the whole of the repayments being about £68,000,000; but as that covered interest spreading over a period of 70 years, there was practically a considerable loss to the Treasury, as the interest in this last year alone was £466,000. Now, as to the Bill itself, he wished briefly to point out the position in which the House stood with regard to it. There were a Public Works Loan Acts Amendment Bill and a Consolidation Bill, both of which stood for second reading. The first made several important changes in the law as it stood, but the latter simply put together, with very little change, the existing Acts, and what he proposed was that the House should give the Amendment Bill a second reading, and that both measures should be referred to the same Select Committee, with a view to their being amalgamated into one, so as to form an Act which he should propose as the basis of a system on which the Government intended to proceed. He thought there would be very little difficulty as to the feasibility of that proceeding after they had heard the evidence of the draftsman. In adopting this plan he intended to make an arrangement for future proceedings, and to introduce separate annual Bills to give effect to the intentions of Parliament. But as the system was not intended to come into operation until next year, it would be necessary this year to introduce a Loan Bill for the purpose of providing the money authorized to be raised under the Acts which had been already passed, and for which there was at present no provision. That, however, had nothing to do with the system which it was proposed to introduce for future years, and that was all he believed he need say with reference to those two Bills. As to the position in which the Government stood with regard to the question of local taxation as affected by the measure at present under consideration, the view which the Government took of the matter was this—that there were two classes of questions to be considered, the placing of the relations between Imperial and local finance on a proper footing, and the alteration and amendment of local finance within itself.

The former of those considerations the Government had deemed it right to place on the first line as being the most important and pressing, but the reverse view was taken by right hon. Gentlemen opposite when they had to deal with the subject. When they were asked to make some provision for the relief of local taxation from the burdens which it was said were unjustly imposed upon it, they generally met the difficulty by urging that the local finance system should, first of all, be placed on a proper footing, and then steps taken in the direction of dealing with Imperial funds. That mode of proceeding had led to little or no result, though it was accompanied by a great deal of sound doctrine. When, therefore, the present Government took up the question, they felt that it could not be satisfactorily dealt with in that way, and that, in point of fact, it was expedient to reverse the process suggested by the Predecessors. They thought it right in those matters to settle their policy first and the machinery after, because the policy being settled, the machinery could be adapted to it. In pursuing the opposite course, they were of opinion that right hon. Gentlemen opposite were wrong, for what were local taxation and local government? They almost invariably involved more or less Imperial considerations. There were questions of education, sanitary questions, and a number of others in respect to almost all of which that observation applied. Taking, for example, the administration of justice, he would ask whether it was not most important that questions affecting that subject should be settled by Imperial authority before the position of the local authorities in connection with it was considered. The hon. Member for Hackney, whenever he spoke on local taxation, told the story of an election incident in Cornwall, in which one of the candidates was told that he had no chance of winning, because he had voted for giving a superannuation allowance to the governor of the prison, the moral being to show how important it was that the ratepayers should exercise some control over expenditure. But what were the merits of the question? In all probability the visiting justices knew what they were about in granting a retiring allowance, and it might have been an unfortunate thing to have en-

months' imprisonment in default of payment. The fine not being paid, the defendant was arrested, which resulted in a threatening attitude being assumed by the diggers, who largely outnumbered the small local police force at the disposal of the authorities. The affair was however, eventually arranged by a cheque being handed in for the amount of the fine, it being understood that it would not be made use of until after an opportunity had been offered of a review of the case by way of appeal in the ordinary course. No troops have been sent, not, as I have heard it stated in some quarters, on account of any difficulties attending their transport, but because in the opinion of Sir Henry Barkly there was no necessity for their despatch.

But as the system was not intended to come into operation until next year, it would be necessary this year to introduce a Loan Bill for the purpose of providing the money authorized to be raised under the Acts which had been already passed, and for which there was at present no provision. That, however, had nothing to do with the system which it was proposed to introduce for future years, and that was all he believed he need say with reference to those two Bills. As to the position in which the Government stood with regard to the question of local taxation as affected by the measure at present under consideration, the view which the Government took of the matter was this—that there were two classes of questions to be considered, the placing of the relations between Imperial and local finance on a proper footing, and the alteration and amendment of local finance within itself.

The former of those considerations the Government had deemed it right to place on the first line as being the most important and pressing, but the reverse view was taken by right hon. Gentlemen opposite when they had to deal with the subject. When they were asked to make some provision for the relief of local taxation from the burdens which it was said were unjustly imposed upon it, they generally met the difficulty by urging that the local finance system should, first of all, be placed on a proper footing, and then steps taken in the direction of dealing with Imperial funds. That mode of proceeding had led to little or no result, though it was accompanied by a great deal of sound doctrine. When, therefore, the present Government took up the question, they felt that it could not be satisfactorily dealt with in that way, and that, in point of fact, it was expedient to reverse the process suggested by the Predecessors. They thought it right in those matters to settle their policy first and the machinery after, because the policy being settled, the machinery could be adapted to it. In pursuing the opposite course, they were of opinion that right hon. Gentlemen opposite were wrong, for what were local taxation and local government? They almost invariably involved more or less Imperial considerations. There were questions of education, sanitary questions, and a number of others in respect to almost all of which that observation applied. Taking, for example, the administration of justice, he would ask whether it was not most important that questions affecting that subject should be settled by Imperial authority before the position of the local authorities in connection with it was considered. The hon. Member for Hackney, whenever he spoke on local taxation, told the story of an election incident in Cornwall, in which one of the candidates was told that he had no chance of winning, because he had voted for giving a superannuation allowance to the governor of the prison, the moral being to show how important it was that the ratepayers should exercise some control over expenditure. But what were the merits of the question? In all probability the visiting justices knew what they were about in granting a retiring allowance, and it might have been an unfortunate thing to have en-forward the question of local taxation and administration, because the present Bill was, as far as he could ascertain, the only one of four measures referred to by the Prime Minister on the opening night of the Session, as likely to be introduced by the Government in order to deal with local taxation, which had up to the present been introduced to Parliament. Although it was not desirable to lay too great stress upon the professions of a Party when in Opposition as compared with the performances of that Party when in office, yet he might be permitted to remark that if such inconsistency was allowed to go beyond a certain limit, no inconsiderable harm might be done to the reputation and character of that House. When the Party now in power was striving for office at the last General Election there was not a voter—at all events a county voter—who was not asked to believe that when the Conservatives came into power the question of local taxation and local government would not be nibbled at, but would be taken up and dealt with in a comprehensive spirit, and, in fact, he believed that many men who had been Liberals voted for Conservative candidates in order to secure that reform. But the Government must know perfectly well, if they watched the signs of the times—the recent election in Wales for instance—what was beginning to be the feeling of the constituencies in reference to the manner in which the promises of the Conservatives had been kept. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had told them that the difference of principle between him and the late Government was, that he wished to determine his policy first and arrange his machinery afterwards. It was not for him (Mr. Fawcett) to defend the late Government, its Members were well able to defend themselves; but it was open to an independent Member to ask whether the present Administration had given any sign of possessing a policy at all with reference to local taxation and administration? They had, it was true, made certain grants to local rates, and intended to make more, for the Chancellor of the Exchequer had informed the House that further grants were to be given from Imperial funds in aid of local taxation, and he had also announced a scheme for the reduction of the National Debt; but it had also been made clear that on the Budget of the year the right hon. Gentleman had not a shilling to spare. That threw new light on the financial proposals of the Government, for it was well known that the present grants in aid of local taxation must at least be doubled in order to carry out the principle of what was known as Sir Massey Lopes' Resolution. It might be all very well to make these grants, but if made in a partial, haphazard, and spasmodic way they were likely to injure the principle of local self-government, and at the same time to perpetrate great injustice. He had a vivid recollection of complaints made from the Opposition benches by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen now in power about the way in which personal property escaped taxation, and the burden was thrown upon land, houses, and business premises. One of the most prominent among the hon. Members making those complaints was the hon. Baronet to whose Resolution he had just referred. He spoke then as if those he represented were suffering under a keen feeling of injustice and wrong; but they never heard his sweet voice now. He had been so securely silenced that he was obliged to see the very wrong he so often denounced greatly aggravated and intensified. Last year in his Budget Speech, the Chancellor of the Exchequer admitted the justice of the complaint, and laid down the sound principle that as you could not get direct contributions from personal property to the local rates, you should make it contribute to the Imperial Revenue, and then pay it from that source to the local finances. Having laid down that doctrine, what did the right hon. Gentleman do? He was a Member of a Government which sanctioned proposal after proposal throwing new charges on the local rates, and he accompanied these new charges, not with any attempt to make personal property contribute more to the aggregate taxation, but with positive proposals to diminish the taxation on personal property to the amount of 33 per cent. He would show by an example how these grants in aid of local taxation from the Imperial funds, instead of diminishing the burden on the most overburdened ratepayers, greatly intensified the injustice under which they suffered. He would put a case—Suppose a clerk, a clergyman, or a half-pay officer with £200 a-year. He had to keep up a respectable appearance on that income. He paid £30 for his house and £8 a-year in rates. Contrast his position with that of the fundholder of £20,000. He had a very small establishment. Everything that was done—whether to make the life and property of the wealthy fundholder more secure, to make the city in which he dwelt more healthful, by embanking rivers or sewer-ing streets—to every one of those objects the poor man, with his £200 a-year, had to contribute, while the wealthy fundholder almost entirely escaped contribution. But to go a little further, this injustice was accumulated. Where did these grants from the Consolidated Fund come from? They were not a bounty rained down from heaven; they represented taxation, every sixpence of which was taken out of the taxpayer's pocket. Five-sixths of the entire Revenue were raised from taxation on commodities; five-sixths of these grants in aid were therefore paid by the consumers of commodities; and therefore, if they increased those grants in aid at the same time that they diminished the taxation on personal property, they very largely increased the burden of the already over-taxed ratepayers. Who contributed most, in proportion to his income, to the taxation on commodities? The man with moderate means. Every article almost consumed by men of moderate income was far more heavily taxed than the articles consumed by the wealthy. Beer and cheap claret paid a much higher percentage of taxation than the best clarets and the more expensive wines. Tobacco was taxed 400 per cent, while the best cigars were taxed only 25 per cent. The best tea was taxed not more than 15 per cent, while the poorer sorts were taxed 45 per cent. Therefore, if the grants in aid from the Consolidated Fund were increased, it was easy to see that they did nothing to relieve those most in want of relief, but that they rather increased the existing inequality of taxation under which they suffered. Leaving what the Government did last year, he would now come to its proposals for the present year. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the discussion of this Bill would probably be lost sight of in the general discussion; but, for his own part, he (Mr. Fawcett) thought he should deal with it as amply as the right hon. Gentleman could desire. What the House had to consider was this—Did this Bill give any security for future reform? Did it lay down any basis on which a superstructure of future reform could be raised? In the first place, what did the Bill not do? It did not touch the incidence of local taxation. It did not deal with the subject of local self-government. It did not do a single thing to check increasing expenditure. It did not provide one single guarantee for economy, but, on the contrary, it was likely to lead to great extravagance. It facilitated borrowing on the vicious principle, that in the present state of taxation, the entire burden of the loans should be thrown on the occupier as distinguished from the owner of property. It did not deal in the slightest degree with the areas of rating, so as to make them less confused. It did not seek to introduce any new principle of uniformity in the assessment or in the valuation. It did not attempt to remove a single iota of the existing chaos with respect to the local government. On the contrary, the Bill was accompanied by a great mass of legislation which would throw additional work on the already overburdened local authorities. And yet this was the chief measure introduced by the Government on local taxation—professing to deal in part, at least, with a subject which, to use the words of the Prime Minister, probably involved one of the greatest violations of justice that could be conceived. The Chancellor of the Exchequer also told them that local taxation was an object of the highest national importance; and he followed up that statement with the remarkable declaration, that at the present moment local taxation was in a worse position than indirect taxation before Sir Robert Peel began his great reforms. When they remembered these declarations, the House would agree with him that the Government were trifling with a great question—they were not touching the source of the evil they admitted, and were intensifying much of the injustice they had themselves so often denounced. But, now, according to the Amendments, of which Notice had been given by two hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House, it seemed that this excuse was going to be set up for the Government—and it had been hinted at by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his speech—"Oh," he said, "we want time; our plans are not matured!" "Want time!" "Our plans not matured!" What was the plan of the same party when the late Government was in office? Everything was to give way to the reform of local taxation and local government. The Conservative Party said that the measures of the late Government were on too great a scale, and that that was one of the reasons why it lost the confidence of the country; but they never lost an opportunity of declaring from the Opposition Benches that the subjects of local taxation and local reform were subjects of such urgent importance that they ought to have priority of everything else. Working up by degrees, how long would it take to reach anything worthy of attainment at the present state of progress? They might as well be told to wait for the journey of a tortoise from John O'Groat's to the Land's End. Now that the Conservatives had come into office, they seemed so paralyzed with inactivity, so destitute of motive power, that they could only gratefully accept a crumb of assistance from whatever quarter it was offered, and the only thing they had done with regard to local taxation was to adopt the measure originally introduced by the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld)—a Bill which in his hands had been contemptuously rejected almost without discussion. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite were, no doubt, accustomed to startling statements; but he ventured to think the Chancellor of the Exchequer was never more surprised than when he heard this modest, unpretentious Bill—a measure introducing some administrative changes—a mere Treasury Bill—suddenly raised by the Prime Minister into national importance as indirectly connected with the question of Local Government. The Bill was happily described as homœopathic, and as a Cambridge man he approved the simile which was used when it was said that the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in attempting to make a mountain out of this little molehill, displayed that peculiar kind of analytical power known to mathematicians as calculating the effect of a small disturbing body on objects of much greater magnitude. What did this Bill amount to? It was said its object was three-fold—first, to give timely notice to the Treasury of the demands to be made on it for loans; secondly, it dealt with what was known as the unexhausted credit system of the Public Loans Commissioners; thirdly, the loans were to be consolidated so as to form a sort of local budget. All these objects of the Bill, as departmental changes, were good enough in themselves, but was it not extraordinary that the Government should endeavour to palm off a measure of this kind, which was nothing more than an attempt to deal in a small way with local administration as being one of the utmost importance to the country? If, however, the Bill was as important as Her Majesty's Government represented it to be, why had it been introduced by the Representatives of the Treasury instead of by the Minister in that House who was responsible for the local government of the country? It became evident from the very first hour that the present Government came into office that, having risen to power by the cry of local taxation, they were going to perform the old feat and kick down the ladder by which they had ascended, because the very first thing they did was to cast a most unusual and unwonted slight upon the Department which was responsible for that local taxation and self-government to the country. For many years previous to the accession of the present Government to power, the Minister of that Department had always been a member of the Cabinet; but the right hon. Gentleman who now presided over the Local Government Board with so much ability was not admitted to a seat in the Cabinet. He was not about to repeat the various rumours that had reached him on the subject; but he might point out that if the head of a Department were not in the Cabinet, the Department was in danger of being ignored, and he was divulging no official secret when he stated that the slight thus cast upon the Local Government Department had been most rightly and keenly resented by those who seemed most interested in its successful working. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that the result of the measure would be that a complete local budget would be laid before that House, something after the manner of the Indian Financial Statement; but the truth was, that as only a very small portion of the sums borrowed by the local authorities was lent by the Government, the local financial statement to be made under this Bill would present a most delusive and misleading view of the real state of affairs for it would deal with only a very small portion of the amounts so borrowed. He feared that if the measure were passed, so far from forming a basis for a local budget, the question of the amount to be advanced to the local authorities would be brought more immediately and directly under the control of party and political influences, and henceforth money would be advanced or withheld, not according to the merits of the case, but according as the Representatives of the borough seeking to borrow were supporters or the opposers of the Government of the day. If that was the case, this was a Bill which, so far from being any reform, was calculated to produce the most mischievous results upon Imperial and local finance, for these loans ought to be granted by bodies as far as possible independent of political influences. No language was too strong to describe the admirable manner in which the Public Works Loan Commissioners had hitherto done their duty, and they had not been influenced by political or Party considerations. Further, except when they had been interfered with by Parliament, they had, during the course of the 30 years they had been in existence, never lost a shilling by bad debts. Nothing more mischievous could be done to Imperial and local finance than to let political influences, which must necessarily be powerful in that House, have the least weight in deciding whether loans should be granted to local authorities, and at what rate of interest. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said it was impossible to take up the whole subject in the present crowded state of the Order Book. The question, however, was not whether the Order Book was or was not crowded, but whether the Government were pursuing the right course in their ordering of Public Business, or whether, indeed, they were pursuing the course which they themselves had said ought to be pursued. The Government had this Session pursued a course of business exactly the reverse of that advocated last year by the right hon. Gentleman, when he said that if they attempted to carry out sanitary and educational measures and schemes for improving the dwellings of the working classes and encouraging providence through friendly societies, while, at the same time, they left the system of local taxation and government unreformed, they would meet with resistance from the local authorities, and would not receive that willing co-operation which was essential to the success of such measures; and the question was whether they were right in doing so. What was the present position of the question of local taxation? The great increase in local taxation had been caused chiefly by perpetually calling new rates into existence, and he would prove how peculiarly unjust was the system of throwing every shilling of the capital and interest of loans for public works upon occupiers and not upon owners. He would take the Artizans Dwellings Bill as an illustration of his proposition. The right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary said that although the Bill would, in the first instance, involve a considerable charge in order to carry it into execution, yet the ratepayers would ultimately be remunerated and recompensed even in a pecuniary sense. Admitting that statement to be strictly accurate, what did it amount to? Supposing £600,000 were required to be raised in order to provide dwellings for the working classes, it must be borrowed on the principle that the whole of the money, principal and interest, should be repaid in 21 years. To do that, it would be necessary to impose a shilling rate, the result being that at the end of that term, the municipality would, according to the supposition of the Home Secretary, find itself in possession of a property worth £800,000. But every shilling of the additional rate would have been paid by the occupiers, while not a farthing would have been contributed by the owners of buildings, or by the owners of the land on which they stood. If, then, the occupiers had given to the municipality a property worth £800,000, the rates would be reduced; if the rates were reduced, rents would be raised; and it came to this—that the occupier of a house would be rated in order to enable the owner ultimately to put the money into his own pocket in the form of increased rent. It was difficult to imagine anything which involved a greater infringement of the principles of financial justice. There could be no doubt that if, for the sake of effecting any improvement, money was borrowed and a new rate imposed to pay the principal and interest of the loan, every shilling of the rate would be paid by the occupiers as distinguished from the owners of farms, houses, and business premises. To bring out the point in a still more striking light, he would state another case which was not an imaginary one. It represented a bit of real life in a parish not very far from the place where they were assembled, where there was a clergyman whose tithes had been commuted for £700 a-year, a non-resident landlord, whose income was supposed to be £10,000 a-year, and who had two farms which were let on long leases. There was also a wealthy stockbroker who rented for £200 a-year the mansion of the non-resident landlord. In consequence of a sum of money having had to be borrowed in order to put the roads in a good state of repair and to make new roads, a shilling rate was to be imposed for a considerable number of years. In what proportion was that shilling highway rate paid? The farmer paid £50 a-year, the non-resident landlord did not pay a halfpenny, the clergyman who kept one carriage paid £35 a-year, and the wealthy stockbroker with, perhaps, £20,000 a-year, and who kept six or seven carriages, paid only £10 a-year. It was impossible to conceive any instance of a more flagrant character, and he did not see how they could be surprised at the opposition shown by local authorities to the imposition of new rates. Did Her Majesty's Government think that their best supporters, the farmers and clergy, would be satisfied, when suffering under such grievances, with a petty proposal for altering in an unfortunate way the relations between the Treasury and the Public Works Loan Commissioners? The Chancellor of the Exchequer was doubtless correct in his statement that that resistance of the local authorities to the imposition of new rates would be so formidable as to prevent that local agency and co-operation without which almost all our efforts at social reform would come to naught. It was equally beyond dispute that the headquarters of the agitation on local taxation had been the Local Taxation Committee of the Central Chamber of Agriculture, and he wished to direct attention to the constitution of that Committee because it might almost be said to wield Ministerial power. It included 62 influential supporters of the Government in the House of Commons, and no fewer than 13 Members of the present Government were members of it. The Marquess of Salisbury was a member, and so was one of the Secretaries to the Treasury, who acted as Government Whip; and if he were to go through the entire list, it would be seen that the Government were bound hand and foot not to do anything displeasing to that committee, which recently issued an instructive and significant report, congratulating its supporters on the circumstance, that in five years it had caused to be withdrawn, defeated, or altered no fewer than 35 out of 41 measures, because they imposed new charges upon the rates. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that that ought to teach us a lesson with regard to the inertia and resistance we should meet with from local authorities, as long as our present system of local taxation and local government remained unreformed; but yet the right hon. Gentleman had not done what might have been expected to neutralize it, for they had been constantly asked to pass Bills which imposed new charges, and the object of his Motion was to remind the Government of the lesson they ought to have learned. He would turn to the Artisans Dwellings Bill, respecting which, the House would remember, there was a strange mystery about the Home Secretary's declarations with regard to it. He (Mr. Fawcett) could never understand why permission should be given to abolish rookeries only in towns containing 25,000, or more, inhabitants; but the report of the Local Taxation Committee let the secret out. That Committee said they would have opposed the Bill, on the old principle that it imposed new charges upon rates; but they refrained from doing so, because it was only permissive, or, in other words, because it was worthless in its character, and only applied to the large towns. He could give another illustration. He had in his possession the report of a most influential meeting held the other day at the Central Chamber of Commerce, which was presided over by a great Friend of popular education—one who, he willingly confessed, had rendered great services to that cause; he meant Lord Hampton. Some Members of the present Government and several of its most influential supporters were also present. What was the language employed at that meeting? "Desirable," it was said, "as we consider to be the spread of education in the rural districts, we are determined to resist its spread if it involves any additional charge upon the rates, as long as the systems of local government and local taxation remain in their present position." Did not such language, coming from such a quarter, solve another mystery? He was bound to say that nothing had caused many hon. Members at that side of the House so much disappointment as the strange disinclination shown by the noble Lord the Vice President of the Council to do anything for education in the rural districts; but no one would be so unjust to the noble Lord as to suppose that he was less anxious now for the spread of rural education than he was formerly. The fact was, that he could not now do anything to promote it. He was a member of the local taxation committee, and knew that if he proposed to do anything with that view, in the spirit of that language, he must be prepared to meet the ratepayers' opposition, and the opposition of the Committee of which he was a member. Well, he (Mr. Fawcett) had already shown the injustice of throwing the entire burden of new local taxation upon one kind of property. Since 1841 no less than £6,000,000 was raised annually in England and Wales, in consequence of new charges upon the rates brought into existence by the House of Commons. Within the last few years they had called into existence 12 new rates, and now another was added. What was the present position of Imperial as compared with local finance? In the case of the former they had had constant remission of taxation, amounting to £27,000,000 in 17 years, or at the rate of £1,750,000 a-year, accompanied by a reduction of Debt; in the case of the latter they had had within 20 years an increase of taxation to the extent of 8 per cent, and the enormous debt created of £80,000,000, which was being added to at the rate of about £3,000,000 a-year. In the metropolis, in one year, within 20 per cent as much was raised by loan as by taxation, and the whole debt of the Metropolitan Board was borrowed on the principle of paying off the total amount of the loans and the interest within a certain number of years. That debt amounted to no less than £9,000,000, and by the principle of payment the house occupiers of London would have to pay the entire debt, in order to make a present of it to the owners of property. But a still greater difference between Imperial and local taxation was shown by this fact—Supposing that any great loss were sustained in the Imperial finance, the attention of the whole country was directed to it, but deficits in local taxation attracted little attention, and though the loans raised were increasing in amount, as were the amounts collected under this head, little notice seemed to be taken by the country generally. Everything connected with it was in such confusion; its administration was so complicated; there were so many authorities and systems of collection that it was impossible for the ratepayers to know what was taking place, or to exercise any sufficient control. In fact, local government and local taxation were so indissolubly mixed up together that the one could not be reformed without the other being also dealt with; and he contended that no attempt to reform local taxation would produce any permanently good effect unless it was accompanied by a reform of the local government under which those taxes were levied. An impression seemed to prevail amongst many persons that this question of local taxation applied only to the residents in the rural districts, or that it had very little to do with the inhabitants of the towns; but that was a mistake. The whole country was almost equally interested in it; but if there was a distinction it was a graver question for the towns than for rural districts. Of the new charges imposed since 1841, amounting to £6,000,000, three-fourths had been borne by the towns. The relative contribution to local burdens by land and by houses was constantly altering. In 1814, seven-tenths was borne by land; in 1842, the proportion had sunk to one-half, and it was now one-third. In 1814, three-tenths was contributed by houses; in 1842, four-tenths; the proportion was now half. It came to this—that whereas in 1814 land contributed 100 per cent more than houses to local taxation, at present houses contributed 50 per cent more than land. Again, rates, as a general rule, were twice as high in large towns as they were in rural districts. He would take the case of four counties, represented by four distinguished local taxation reformers. In South Devon the rates in the rural districts were 3*s.* 2*d.*; in Plymouth they amounted to 6*s.* 10*d.* The rates in the rural districts of Wiltshire were 3*s.*; in Salisbury they were 7*s.* 10*d.* In South Leicestershire the proportion was 4*s.* 4*d.* as compared with 8*s.* 7*d.* in Leicester; and in Norfolk 3*s.* 1*d.*, as compared with 7*s.* 1*d.* in Norwich. He adduced these facts to show that nothing could be a greater delusion than to suppose that this question was of greater interest for rural districts than for the inhabitants of the towns. There was an unfortunate impression that prevailed upon the subject, for it was by some supposed that although local taxation was increasing in England, it was not augmenting in proportion to the general wealth of the people and the number of houses. He found, however, that in the parish of Liverpool since 1841 the contributions levied from each ratepayer had increased by 340 per cent. In some of the suburban districts the rates of increase had been 300 per cent. Great as had been the increase it had been inadequate to meet the increase of expenditure, for there had been added to the debt of Liverpool in 30 years an augmentation of 360 per cent. Anyone who looked into the system of local government would find that every guarantee for economy was destroyed, and all administrative efficiency taken away, and unless those were supplied by an improved system of local government it was impossible to reform local taxation. What occurred in town and county respectively? In towns there were usually four rating authorities—the town council, the local board of health, the board of guardians, and the school board. These authorities employed in some places a different basis of assessment and valuation; and further, the rates were collected by different officials, and at different times. There was no reason why the Government should not have introduced a Bill putting all this upon an equal basis. The position of the counties was in some cases better, in others worse; but generally there was great confusion of areas and not the smallest share of representation on the part of the ratepayers. The farmers must have expected that on the first day of the Session the present Government would have brought in a Bill establishing financial boards for county expenditure; but they did not seem likely at present to get the smallest shadow of representation in expending the county rates. In counties there were three authorities—the highway board, the Poor Law guardians, and the county magistrates. What, however, was worse than this conflict of authorities was the indescribable confusion that prevailed in everything connected with the taxation and assessment of property. A former Member of that House—Sir Edward Kerrison—had in an extremely able letter pointed out that there were three different bodies to levy the rates and taxes on property, and three different principles of assessment—namely, the commissioners of property tax, the assessment committee for poor rates, whose action varied in every union, and the committee of quarter sessions for the county rate. Sir Edward Kerrison said that one simple reform would be to adopt one uniform principle of valuation, and to get rid of the waste and loss of efficiency from having so many conflicting bodies. Besides, these local authorities often had to administer statutes which absolutely baffled interpretation. Mr. Justice Wightman, in deciding a case as to rating waterworks, said that it was absolutely impossible for any person in the world to interpret the statute, and he added that he thought it quite as likely that his decision was wrong as that it was right. This local taxation was not a mere fiscal matter, and he would show that it had a serious bearing upon the social, as well as the fiscal condition of the country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in his Budget Speech of last year, referred to the wonderful prosperity of the country and to the great reduction of taxation; and he went on to say that there was one dark and dreadful blot in our social condition—namely, that the country was at the present moment spending more for the relief of the poor than before the great financial and commercial reforms of Sir Robert Peel. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had also spoken of our prosperity increasing by “leaps and bounds,” and yet the unprecedented accumulation of wealth was powerless to arrest the increase of pauperism. This growth of pauperism was intimately connected with the system of poor relief. Whenever a check was put upon out-door relief, pauperism declined; but whenever out-door relief was encouraged, the people were demoralized. The Irish were generally regarded as a thriftless people, and the Scotch as prudent and careful, and yet because out-door relief was given in Scotland with a lavish hand there was in Scotland five times, and in the Highlands of Scotland 12 times, as much pauperism as in Ulster and Connaught. In some parishes of Scotland 1 in 8, 9, or 10 of the population was in the receipt of parish relief; and in some of the rural districts of England where out-door relief was allowed, 1 in 12 and 1 in 14 of the population were paupers. Contrast this with the remarkable decline of pauperism in London. The House had often heard of the pauperism of the East End, but there was less pauperism there than in almost any other part of England. While in the rural districts 1 in 14 were paupers, in Bethnal Green only 1 in 39, and in Shore-ditch only 1 in 44 were in receipt of parish relief. The reason was that out-door relief had been discouraged in the metropolis by a Bill brought in by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. Goschen), which made it the interest of the parish authorities to give as little out-door relief as possible; and so well had that Act worked, that the Local Taxation Committee were of opinion that if a similar scheme were adopted for the rest of England equally satisfactory results would follow. The subject had, therefore, something more than a financial bearing, but went down into the social and moral condition of the people. The Government had excused themselves by the plea of want of time for not giving their attention to this important subject. That, however, could not be the case, because last Session they had such an abundance of leisure that night after night they occupied their spare time by attempting to pass a measure they did not understand. Surely, when they could restore the semblance of Purchase in the Army, they could have contrived to give the agriculturists some share of representation in connection with local taxation. He would not do the Government so much injustice as to suppose they had no plans ready, and that after years of clamouring about local taxation, they were in entire ignorance of what was required to provide a remedy for a state of things they had so repeatedly declared to be fraught with injustice. He was not going to explain their strange inactivity; all he would say was that he believed it was an inactivity which would not meet with the approbation of the country. He had had frequent occasion to refer to the Local Taxation Committee of the Chamber of Agriculture, and he could assure the House that their reports were a perfect mine of information. Before he sat down he should like to refer to a speech which only a few weeks since, in April last, had been given by an hon. Member whom they all highly respected, and who was regarded as a great authority on the subject of local taxation—namely, the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), who was Chairman of that Committee. That hon. Gentleman said, at the close of a very able speech—

“That it must not be supposed because he was a Tory he was prepared to make any concession to the present Government on the subject; on the contrary, he should pursue exactly the same course in respect to it towards Mr. Disraeli that he had adopted towards Mr. Gladstone,” adding that “he was by no means satisfied with the time which had been taken up by the present Government in reference to it.”

Those remarks had been made only a few weeks ago, and yet not much had been done in the matter since that time. But the hon. Gentleman went on to say that—

“He should take every opportunity in their name of expressing the dissatisfaction which they felt not only by words, but by taking every opportunity of dividing the House, even if only 10 Members went with him into the lobby.”

That remark was received by the meetings with cries of “Bravo,” in which the Members of the Government who were present, it appeared, heartily concurred. The hon. Gentleman concluded his speech by some observations which excited the enthusiasm of the assembled farmers. He said—

“If I do all this, you must do something in return, and if you only support me as you supported Sir Massey Lopes, we shall bring this question well under the notice of Her Majesty’s Government.”

Now, it would, he felt, be presumptuous on his part to add a single word to so forcible an avowal of opinion and so admirable a declaration of policy, and he would conclude with the words adopted by the Local Taxation Committee, to whose report he had occasion so frequently to refer in terms of approval, that—

"The reform of local taxation and local government is not a question either of party or individuals, but the common interest of every man in Britain."

In conclusion, he thanked the House for having so patiently listened to him, and begged to move his Amendment.

SIR THOMAS ACLAND seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the absence of other and adequate proposals for the reform of Local Taxation and Local Government, this Bill cannot be regarded as meeting the necessities of the time or the expectations which have been raised by Her Majesty's Government, and this House is of opinion that further delay of legislation on these subjects is calculated to impede the social and economic progress of the Country,"—(Mr. Fawcett,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. PAGET said, he had listened with astonishment to the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett), and begged to congratulate the whole race of Local Taxation Reformers on the unexpected support which they now received from a recent ally who appeared in the light of a Nineteenth Century Columbus to reveal to them a new land. He could not help thinking, however, that the series of marvellous facts with which the hon. Gentleman sought to startle the House had been long well known. But where, he should like to ask, was the hon. Gentleman when the Resolution of his hon. Friend the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) was carried by a majority of 100, and what evidence was there in the inconsistency of a Welsh constituency of any inconsistency on the part of the Government? He, for one, could not forget how the question of local taxation was met some years ago by the Friends of the hon. Gentleman. The Government of that day treated the grievances complained of as being of no consequence, and, indeed, as mere fictions. And when, thanks to the efforts of the hon. Member for South Devon, the question came to be better understood, the right

hon. Gentleman the Government had warnings, and argued better be let Member for Hackney Government had with the question (Mr. Paget) joined that regret; but the Exchequer had all one of the reasons had not done so well. Surely, it was not Government that due commercial prospects ceased to advance bounds which deluged of the Exchequerment. It must be had now a Government tempted to do something. An Act by which build the Government rates. At the same introduced into the extension of the Imperial subventions—and half the cost of the expense of now borne by the Government. The hon. Member no way exaggerate the subject. The were raised by divisible into two namely, remunerative taxation. provided in the Revenue Government Boards. remunerative tax which was for local question arose as convention. The for local purposes, a from local sources remunerative taxation raised for the property and for the that gave rise to grievances of local sums raised under remunerative taxation rapidly. In 1851 under that head £6,500,000; in 18 was £12,342,000. that the poor rate cause wages had in additional reason stances, the Poor Law was conducted on a sounder system than it had ever been conducted before. For the support of elementary schools, which the nation had declared should exist everywhere, there was raised in the year 1872 by local taxation £302,000; and in the year 1874, £539,000. It might be objected that voluntary subscriptions were not local taxation—but to him it appeared these voluntary subscriptions were very like the free-will offerings of the people to the sons of the priest—“Nay, but thou shalt give it to me, or else I will take it by force.” A statute was in the immediate back ground; let the subscriptions cease for a moment and a school board and school rate was the inevitable consequence. Such items as these ought, he considered, to be taken into calculation in any investigation into the aggregate amount of the local burdens of the nation. Under the head of highways, local expenditure was increasing from year to year, because turnpike trusts were being rapidly abolished. From a recent Return which had been presented to the House, it appeared that in the month of February of this year there was a material decrease of pauperism as compared with the same month last year. But then, as regarded South Wales, there was a material increase, a large part of the burden of which must be borne by the small tradesmen and small farmers of that district, who thus would have to pay for the unsettled state of coal and iron. Hon. Gentlemen had been accustomed to lament the rapid decay of freeholders; but he did not think the ingenuity of statesmen could devise anything better adapted to lead to that result than the imposition on them of rates which by any possibility they could not support. He would give an illustration of the way in which a tenant-farmer was affected by local taxation. A penny in the pound of local taxation was, in many cases, equivalent to three or four times that amount in the shape of income tax. For instance, the income of the occupier of a farm whose rent was £300 a-year would be taken for the purpose of income tax at one-half, or £150. From that sum £80 would be deducted, and the addition of a penny in the pound income tax would make a difference of only 70*d.* But let a penny in the pound be put on as local taxation, and what would be the result? The rateable value of the farm would probably be £270, and therefore a penny rate would yield 270 pence, or nearly four times as much as a penny income tax. Let hon. Members contrast the position of such an occupier with that of a man living by his side, and enjoying an income derived, perhaps, from railways, of £150. He would probably live in a house of £15 a-year rent, which would be rated at £12, and a penny rate on him would yield 12*d.* instead of 270*d.* Who could wonder that the occupiers of land should feel such a state of things as a great grievance? But the grievance was not confined solely to occupiers of land; it also affected occupiers of houses to an enormous extent. The hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone), who had taken an interest in this question, some years ago told the House in an instructive speech that in Liverpool he had found incomes of £15,000 a-year rated at 1 per cent, while the earner of a weekly wage of 24*s.* had to pay at the rate of 4 per cent. In fact, there was ample evidence that this question affected small occupiers to a greater extent than almost any other class. There had grown up an artificial system since the days of Elizabeth. The Act of Elizabeth was not a charge on land for the maintenance of indigent poor, but on every inhabitant to contribute to his ability, and had it been so enforced down to this time, they would have heard but little of the grievances of local taxation. He was delighted to hear from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that it was the intention of the Government to assume, as an Imperial charge, the administration of justice, and that he felt, also, the immense importance of having a new valuation Bill. On previous occasions the House had heard of his readiness to support a Consolidated rate, and it was to be hoped that the Government would announce before long that they were alive to the necessity of dealing with the subject of highways and turnpikes. There was to be an annual presentation of local accounts. These were all the things for which he and his Friends had been asking. They could not be expected all at once; but already there had been a substantial instalment of justice, coupled with distinct assurances of further progress in the same direction. Though there was much in it which demanded reform, it must be allowed that local taxation had within itself elements of great advantage to the nation. It was intimately bound up with self-government—a principle of which it was impossible to speak in terms of too high praise, which stimulated all loyal citizens to devote themselves to the various departments of local administration, which brought about a mingling of classes united to consider subjects of common interest, and in which the humblest ratepayer had as great a right to be heard as the noblest in the land. There was much danger in that constant professorial craving after an Utopian optimism, which seemed to expect that everything should be done, and that everything should be done at once. That cry was generally linked with another—that the Government should step in and do everything. Now, he viewed with profound suspicion every attempt to introduce the Imperial finger into the local pie. Nothing should be done tending to interfere with or destroy the principle of local self-government. The hon. Member for Hackney said the Government were inconsistent and had not fulfilled their pledges, so that they could not be looked to for relief. But could the late Government be looked to? There, at least, was a Government which had done nothing, while the present Government had done something. More than 20 years ago the Premier, to his great credit, was the first statesman to direct attention to the subject of local taxation, and, equally to his credit, he had been the first statesman to deal practically with the question and give some relief to those who bore this burden. He (Mr. Paget) did not desire to over-estimate the good works of the present Government—he was fully aware of all the difficulties and intricacies of this important subject—he knew its details far too well not to feel sure that it would tax, and tax severely, the energies and abilities of the strongest Government. What local taxation reformers desired was nothing but straightforward justice. The question was an intricate one. He desired that it should be settled on the old-fashioned principles laid down by Adam Smith and endorsed by the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright)—“that every man and every description of property should be called upon in just proportions to support the burdens and meet the necessities of the State.” Looking to the antecedents of the Ministry, at what they had done and were doing even in the Bill now before the House, he was sure that they were both able and willing to deal with this question fairly, and therefore he felt satisfied that those who wished for reform in the matter of local taxation would do well and wisely in leaving their interests in the hands of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. RIDLEY said, that he had placed on the Paper an Amendment, in the event of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) becoming a substantive Motion, to the effect—

“That, inasmuch as Her Majesty's present Government have during their tenure of office recognized to a greater extent than any previous Administration the necessity of redressing the inequalities and anomalies of Local Taxation and Local Government, it is, in the opinion of this House, inexpedient to hamper or embarrass their action in this direction.”

He had been told by some of his Friends that the words of his Amendment expressed too great satisfaction at the conduct of Government in the matter. Such, however, had not been his intention. His object, in the first place, was, from an independent point of view, to challenge directly the obstructive Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney, so as far as possible to prevent the Government from being pressed too hardly or too prematurely, and, at the same time, to encourage them to persevere in a prudent and practical manner in the course upon which they had entered by that kind of gratitude known as a lively sense of favours to come. The Successors of the late Government had acceded to power pledged to a greater extent than their Predecessors to reform in the matter of the local administration of taxation; and, therefore, when upon the Motion for the second reading of this Bill they were met by an Amendment which imputed to them a want of policy, it appeared to him that a comparison between the conduct of the late and the present Government in that respect became inevitable. Since 1868 there had been a succession of measures introduced on the subject by the right hon. Member for the City (Mr. Goschen) and by the right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), all of which had come to nothing, and the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes) had carried in 1872 by a large majority—he believed 100—the principle that local taxation must be dealt with in a liberal and comprehensive manner. He thought that since their accession to office the present Government had shown a disposition to act upon that Resolution of the House, and that they were not open to the complaints which had been urged against them in this respect. The hon. Member for Hackney wanted to compel Her Majesty's Government to produce an all-comprehensive scheme of reform. On a Bill which was no doubt a step in the right direction, he raised a large question which had nothing whatever to do with it. Surely, however, the position he had taken up would not meet with the approval of the House or of the country, and in particular of those who had dealt with the subject in the late Parliament, and who were conversant with the difficulties surrounding it? The late Government might have done more if their measures had been less heroic, and if, like reasonable statesmen, they had tried to deal in a more piecemeal way with the difficulties which were before them. His (Mr. Ridley's) contention was, that the Government had done a great deal in the right direction, and that while there was no intention that they should stop, or even linger in the path they were now pursuing, it was unwise and unfair to ask them to do what was impossible. He now came to the performances of Her Majesty's Government. The proposals of the Chancellor of the Exchequer last year with regard to local taxation were received with considerable satisfaction both by that House and the country, although they met with considerable criticism by the late Prime Minister. The majority of that House, however, thought the grants which were made last year were not given one moment too soon, while they were made in such a manner as in no way to impair the guarantee which then existed with regard to local economy. It was perfectly reasonable, however, after the promises made by them, that the hon. Member for Hackney should expect great things of the present Government. At the end of his Amendment, the hon. Member laid considerable stress upon the delay which he alleged the Government were causing in the natural, social, and economical progress of the country by refusing to legislate in this direction. That they were doing something in the matter, however, was evidenced by the Artizans Dwellings Bill and the consolidation of the Public Health Acts; and, in spite of what the hon. Gentleman had said about their neglecting education in the rural districts, the House would not forget that the Revised Code was received with signal favour by the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster). Neither could it be said that the Government were not sensible of the advantages of education, nor that they were not doing great good in putting Friendly Societies upon a sound footing, and thus encouraging provident habits amongst the people. The practical relief given by the £1,011,000 voted to the police and pauper lunatics was a great benefit to the country, and the rating area was increased thereby. He did not suppose that any Government could do all that was expected of them by any class of local taxation reformers. If the hon. Member for Hackney meant to say that it was now fairly expected that the Government should prepare and carry through a complete scheme for revising all these grievances of local reform and local taxation of which he complained, he (Mr. Ridley) thought the House would agree that that demand was of a most unreasonable character. The country had no reason to doubt the willingness of the Government to carry out what they could, or for distrusting their declarations, when they were told by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that what they had done and were doing was only an earnest of what they intended to do. Whatever was done, they should bear in mind the principle that all persons who paid towards local taxation had unquestionably the right to control the expenditure. The hon. Member for Hackney spoke of the importance of a proper administration of the Poor Law, especially with regard to out-door relief, and there was no doubt that, as the relief of the poor was a national object, it was one which might be contributed to from Imperial resources. That principle had been admitted by the Government in making the grant for the police and for pauper lunatics; and there was no reason in principle why they should not for South Devon had in his famous speech asked for the whole charge connected with the administration of justice, half the charge for lunatics, and half that of the police, and the present Government were so far committed, having voted for the hon. Baronet's Resolution. As comparisons had been instituted between the present and the late Governments, he might remark that, although the late Government proposed to consider last of all the question of grants from the Imperial Exchequer, yet their scheme included other subjects which had not been dealt with by the Government now in office. If it was urged that the present Government had not sufficient money at their disposal, he would point out that the two first schemes could be brought in without money. A Valuation Bill and a Consolidated Rate Bill might have been introduced this year by Her Majesty's Government. Again, the Government might have dealt with the chaotic condition of the local administrative units which overlapped and confused one another in so puzzling a manner. And here, in justice, he must say that with respect to what had been done by the late Government, the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Stansfeld) was the only person who had contributed anything towards reducing the confusion which existed under the present system; because he had brought the administration of the laws affecting health in the country districts into a more intelligible form. That was a point which ought not to be overlooked in discussing the credit which ought to be given to the late Government. The present Government, he trusted, would not mistake the feeling of the country on this subject. The country was under the impression that the Government had been playing fast-and-loose; that they had promised largely, especially before the last General Election, and had not performed what they promised. ["No, no!"] Why, that evening the Chancellor of the Exchequer, though vaguely re-assuring, had given the House no definite account of the policy he meant to pursue. He trusted, however, that before the debate closed a definite statement would be made by some other Member of the Government. If, after all that had been said, the House should separate that Session without hon. Members being enabled by the Government to make those agricultural orations which would be expected from them by their constituents, he should stand up and say that he was compelled to separate himself from the Government on this question. He was in hopes that another Session would not have been allowed to pass by without something material being done, and he considered that the statement made on the part of the Government that evening was not a satisfactory one.

MR. RATHBONE said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had remarked that we ought to settle our policy first and our machinery afterwards, but that was precisely what neither the late nor the present Government had done. It was not necessary that the whole of the reform of local taxation and local administration should be done at once; but it was necessary that the Government should form some consistent and intelligible plan; and that they should so far take the House into their confidence as to the general outline of that plan as to enable them to judge whether the measures brought before them to carry it out would really do so effectually; and the Conservative Government ought to undertake this at once, because it had been so much discussed at the last Election, and so many pledges had been given upon the subject, that the country expected it; and they would have the support of public opinion in carrying it out. Then they possessed great advantages in having so many men in their Party, who, as Chairmen of Quarter Sessions and Chairmen of Boards of Guardians, had taken an active part in local administration, and had become thoroughly convinced of the necessity of reform; and they possessed an unusual number of men, disciplined by recent adversity into obedience, who had paid great attention to the question, and the Government would be acting in a spirit of treason to their supporters if, while yet in their youth and vigour, they did not introduce some measure for carrying out such a plan of legislation as was now demanded. The late Government, no doubt, had been accused of "humbugging" the House by leading them to believe that they had a plan in hand, which they did not produce. The consequence was that they only awoke to the importance of the subject when they found themselves not strong enough to carry any measure of local taxation worth acceptance by the Legislature. Would the great Country Party allow the Government to carry on the same game as the late Government did, and in the end permit them to be turned out of office before this important question was settled? Perhaps, from the necessities of the case, Prime Ministers knew very little of the subject, and the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Government so underestimated its importance that he had not given the President of the Local Government Board a seat in the Cabinet, notwithstanding the fact that the well-being of the country depended upon the action and good government of that Board. The present machinery for the carrying on of local government was cumbrous, confusing, and unsatisfactory; for local authorities in the country were, in the first instance, obliged to communicate with the Local Government Board in the metropolis, and after, perhaps, a long correspondence had taken place everything was thrown into confusion, and in the end nothing was done. The statement of a matter might be sent up to the Board, and then an Inspector might be sent down who, if his offices had been made available in the first instance, might have settled the question in 10 minutes. Therefore, while he admitted that there was a fair claim for further concessions in aid of local burdens, he trusted that the Government would give away no more money in that direction until they had promoted, or were prepared to submit, some scheme of reform in reference to the relations which existed between the local bodies and the central authority. In a pamphlet which he (Mr. Rathbone) had ventured to send to Members of the House, he had strongly urged that all capitalists, both the payers of income tax and the owners of real property, should be led, by feeling the direct burthen of local expenditure, to take a more active interest in the expenditure of local funds. He should deeply regret if the Conservative Government were to omit the present opportunity of enlisting their interest in the subject by dividing the rates between owners and occupiers, and giving the former direct representation on the county boards, to which they would in this case be entitled. If this was done, as was the case in Ireland and Scotland, the owners of property in England would, like the owners of property there, take a more active interest in local affairs. They had better do this at once, for sooner or later they would have to pay the taxes, which, indeed, ultimately fell upon them; and it was far better that they should take that interest before the burden was tied permanently around their necks. Later on they might find they would have fresh taxation put upon them, but without that power which they might now have of controlling that taxation by preventing waste. The Secretary for War (Mr. Hardy) had introduced a plan for the extension of the area of rating. No man understood the subject better than the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and if he and other Members of the Government, some of whom were not in the Cabinet, could only carry out their own views, he believed it would soon be seen that the subjects of local taxation and local government were, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Advisers, worthy of Imperial consideration. Many hon. Members opposite who addressed the House made excellent speeches in favour of the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney; but he was sorry to say they did not appear to him to be as independent as hon. Members on his side of the House. The speeches made were in favour of the Motion; but the hon. Gentlemen who made them declared their determination to support the Government. For his own part, he did not look upon the question in a Party light at all, and should certainly support the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney.

Mr. BENTINCK believed that hon. Members on his—the Conservative—side of the House were very well able to take care of themselves, but for himself, in dealing with the question before the House, he should do so on its merits, and not as a Party question. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had quoted the speech of the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), to the effect that this was not a Party question, and the hon. Member for Hackney supported that view. But then what was the purport of the Amendment he had submitted to the House? There was no affinity whatever between the arguments of the hon. Member and the object of his Resolution. His language was a succession of able arguments in favour of dealing with the question of local taxation; but the obvious meaning of the Motion was, that the present Government should be turned out, and the

hon. Gentlemen on the other side let in. The Motion was simply a Vote of Want of Confidence in Her Majesty's Government. They should deal, therefore, with the hon. Gentleman's Motion and with its obvious meaning and object. For his part, he was no believer in the infallibility of the Government, and he regretted many things they had done; but that was not the question he had to consider. What he had to consider was a choice of evils, and in making that choice, he regarded them as preferable to hon. Gentlemen opposite. Although he did not approve all the acts of the present Government, or endorse what they had done on all occasions—and on many occasions he thought their proceedings deplorable—yet he had to compare what they had done with the proceedings of hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. Even upon the question of local taxation he regretted the course taken, or, rather, that had not been taken, by the present Government. They had shown a want of energy in dealing with the most important question of the day. But the only way of judging a Motion of this kind was by its results, and let him suppose that the hon. Member for Hackney succeeded in carrying his Motion. The result would be to upset the present Government, and where was the new Government to come from? He hardly thought that the hon. Member for Hackney would be able, if called upon, to form a strong Liberal Government. He must then suppose that it would be necessary to fall back upon the noble Lord the Leader of the Liberal Party, and, without imputing any blame to him, the noble Lord would find himself in a difficult, if not a hopeless position, if he were called upon by Her Majesty to form a Government. There were certain historical facts that could not be lost sight of, and, repudiating Party views, he would, nevertheless, ask what was the present position of the Liberal Party? The present condition of the great Liberal Party was this—that by great energy, talent, ability, eloquence, and administrative power they had succeeded in the course of five years in turning a majority of 120 into a minority of 60 or 70. What, then, was the object of the hon. Member in bringing forward a Motion, the result of which would be to turn out the Government in order to leave the country in a position of utter chaos, and to bring in a party who could not form a Government, and who, if the attempt were made, would bring all government to an end? The experience of the last 25 years had shown the House that it must not hope much from any Government, but the country must have a Government of some kind, and the House was bound to make the best of the Government it had got. He, therefore, wished the hon. Member for Hackney had on the present occasion turned his attention to some subject more worthy of his undoubted powers and ability.

MR. PELL said, that as a speech delivered by him outside the walls of Parliament had been referred to by the hon. Member for Hackney, he would only say that he did not wish to take exception to the accuracy of the quotation, neither did he wish to disown any of the remarks contained in it. On the contrary, he wished to reiterate his opinion that this was not a Party question, and he could only regret that it had been brought under the notice of the House in this indirect manner. Last year the Chancellor of the Exchequer put this question first, because he said it seemed to the Government that it was an object of the highest national interest at that time. This being the opinion of the Government, it was singular that such a question should be brought before the House in this indirect manner. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had in his Financial Statement exhibited some of the most brilliant qualities that the House expected to find in a statesman, when his right hon. Friend was called upon to reply to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich. His right hon. Friend had pointed out that although there had been great remissions of Imperial taxation, there was another side of finance that required attention, and that was the great question of direct local taxation. Regretting, as he did, that the Government last year were led to give up the only means of making any sensible contribution towards local taxation, he must remind hon. Members opposite that when the late Premier went out of office he stated it to be his intention, if the next Parliament gave him a majority, to abandon the whole of the income tax. If the whole income tax had been abandoned, he did not know to what source we should have looked for subventions in aid of local taxation. Of course, the Opposition could not be looked to for help in the form of money contribution. Administrative reform was to some extent independent of larger considerations, and it was fair to ask whether any change was to be made in administration, or whether matters were to go on as at present. Of course, he was not so visionary as to expect that anything could be done this Session. One reason for urging reform in administration was that at present there was enormous waste—waste of power, ability, and money, and much of it was due to centralization. Was there a single fund raised by local authorities of which it might not be truly said that the control and disposal of it was not in the main vested in the hands of the Treasury? There was just enough of local control to leave room for a vast amount of misgovernment. The House contained many county and borough magistrates, and he would ask them what they thought of our prison management. What influence did they exercise upon it? A prison had to be built upon a certain plan, the cells had to be of a certain size, and the diet had to be of a certain amount and quality. Having determined all these things, it was the duty of the Government to see that there were not too many prisons in the country. Yet no Government had ever given any attention to this part of the question. There were 116 local gaols, costing £585,000 a-year, and the average cost of the prisoners was £33 per head; but of the 81 county prisons, 12 contained more than half the total number of prisoners, and maintained them at an average cost of £25, while the remaining 69 maintained their quota at a cost of £34 a-head, or £9 more than the cost of the larger gaols, showing that large numbers of prisoners could be kept at a cheaper rate than smaller ones. Similar contrasts were presented by the borough prisons; for there were six borough gaols containing 3,000 prisoners, and 29 with only 1,370 inmates. The cost of the first was £76,000 annually, and that of the latter £54,000. These were matters of as great, if not greater, importance than the Regimental Exchanges Bill, about which there had been so much squabbling in that House, and the reason why it was not admitted was that no one touched upon them out-of-doors. He, however, suggested that the necessity of reform in these matters should be pressed upon the Government.

In Lincolnshire there were five gaols for the accommodation of 200 prisoners, and he appealed to the House if anything could be more monstrous. Then there was corresponding waste in the organization of the police. In England there were 225 separate Forces, in Ireland but one—happy Ireland. There were 10,000 police in the metropolis; nearly 10,000 in the 57 counties; in the 166 boroughs there were 8,000 police; in 62 of them there were less than 10 policemen; 22 where there were less than three; and there were several boroughs with a mayor, common council, beadle, and gaoler, with one, and a few with two policemen each. The waste of money in that respect must be obvious, while the many independent jurisdictions afforded the well-informed criminal great facilities of escape, and gave discharged police officers the means of passing from one Force to another without detection. There was also great waste in sanitary administration. There were 6,529 parishes, and 454 were under turnpike trusts. He had seen one authority constructing a drain on sound principles on one side of the road, and another authority constructing a deficient drain on the other side of the road. He should have been pleased if the Public Health Bill had put a stop to waste of this kind. Then, again, the waste with reference to the poor was also very great; but he had no wish to see the pinch of the poor rates relieved by Imperial subventions. In 1854, the cost of an individual pauper was £6 2s. It was now £8 15s., which was owing not to the local, but to the central administration of the Poor Law. The central government had required the local governments to furnish paupers with better doctors. The other day the central government required a local authority to expend £4,000 for baths for paupers. In 20 years the cost of maintaining paupers had increased 42 per cent. A great deal of the increase of local taxation was owing to successive Governments having permitted the local authorities to be increased in number. For instance, in Sunderland there were the River Wear Commissioners, having 51 members; the River Wear Watch Committee, 21 members; the town council, 64 members; elected guardians, 12; and ex officio guardians, 3. There was a school board which occupied the attention of 34 gentlemen; a local government board of 13 members; churchwardens, overseers, and 24 ancient vestrymen. There were in this union altogether 13 boards, with 311 members, and there were many other districts in England where they had a similar state of things. With regard to the rating of incomes, the question was not so much the amount of the income as the source from which a man derived it. If he derived it from land, then he paid more than he ought to pay. The hon. Member for Hackney spoke of a clergyman with an income of £200 a-year paying £8 in rates. He (Mr. Pell) did not know any part of England where a clergyman with that income would not have to pay £20 in rates. In his (Mr. Pell's) parish he would have to pay from £25 to £30. The system under which rates were levied in Scotland and Ireland was totally different from that under which rates were levied in England. If the principle adopted in Ireland and the analogous one in Scotland were right, then our principle must be wrong. In his opinion, another Session should not be allowed to go by without the Government of the day dealing with this question. Supposing him to have at present what he had not often, a thousand pounds to spare. He should not be afraid to invest it in French Rentes, where he would get 5 per cent for it, without any local taxation; but if he put it into draining, into buildings, or improvements on English land, he would be watched from the hills of the adjacent lands, and he would be locally taxed in a most unjust manner. Suppose, again, he put his thousand pounds into a spinning speculation, and built a small pantile factory, he would only be locally taxed a small amount. He submitted that the present system of rating operated as a great discouragement to improvements, and made men afraid to build cottages on their land. Much as he should like to support any Motion which might stimulate the Government to deal with all these questions, yet, considering the quarter from which this Amendment came, he felt he had no choice but to vote against it. There were hon. Members sitting on the opposite side of the House who, if they had put a Motion of this sort on the Paper, there was no doubt he would have had his support; but he could not forget the antecedents of the hon. Member for Hackney. That hon. Gentleman on every opportunity which presented itself—and he (Mr. Pell) had taken some trouble not to miss them—had recorded his vote against the views of the Local Taxation Committee. He had voted against the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Devon for the relief of local taxation, and he also voted against the relief of the counties from the cost of Militia stores; while in his own Motion for the payment of election expenses out of the rates, he would have saddled the ratepayers with an immense cost—not in the matter of hustings and booths, but in the host of candidates which such legislation as that would have brought into the field, nor had they had the weight of his vote upon the question of the Education rate. He thought he had said enough to show that to support the Motion would be an act of ingratitude to the Government, and would not be acting wisely to give his vote for this Amendment.

CAPTAIN NOLAN said, he was of opinion that the antecedents of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) were not to be considered an argument against the present Motion. He did not care from what quarter it came, but would speak of it as it regarded the Irish farmer, for as he understood it, the hon. Gentleman's Amendment was intended to cover the Three Kingdoms. He only wished the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) would invest that £1,000 of which he had spoken in the acquisition of an Irish farm, for then, unless he had the disposition of a Mark Tapley, he would feel that his position was not by any means a comfortable one. The Irish farmers were in this position—that they were considered very proper persons to pay the rates, but not at all proper persons to elect those who should say how they were to be expended. In one respect they were better off than the English farmers, inasmuch as there was not in Ireland the same complexity and confusion of administration which existed in this country; but what they had to complain of was the extreme simplicity of the injustice to which they were subjected. The course in Ireland was this—The sheriff of the county selected a body of 23 gentlemen—the Grand Jury—to administer the whole of the county cess. In his county the selection generally fell upon the 23 gentlemen having the highest rental within the county; but in other counties that was not the case, for it frequently happened that a large portion of the Grand Jury was made up of the personal friends of the high sheriff, and that was the body which had the administration of the taxation in question. He did not ask now that half the county rates should be taken off the occupier, and put on the landlord, but only that the burden of them should not be increased; and he therefore hoped that the question of local administration in Ireland would be taken up by the Government. If not so, he trusted that when the measures which had been introduced by Irish Members relating to the subject came on for discussion, no objection would be made to the providing of elective boards chosen by the ratepayers and farmers. That was what they wanted in Ireland as well as in England.

SIR GEORGE JENKINSON rose merely to state the reason why he did not wish to give a silent vote on the present occasion. He did not wish to go into the general question, because the arguments, which were all on one side, had been threshed out. But he hoped that the Government would read aright the lesson taught by that debate. Every speaker, no matter on what side he sat, had testified to the grievance in respect of local taxation. The Prime Minister had already admitted the injustice of the present state of things, and so had the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Those arguments had been urged and repeated over and over again, and he trusted the Government would take courage and remember that so long as they left the question unsettled, the stronger would the feeling of dissatisfaction throughout the country become, and the result would be that they would lose caste. Last year the Chancellor of the Exchequer had £6,000,000 surplus to deal with, which had been found for him by the extra taxation of his Predecessors, and that large sum he gave away in remitting the sugar duties, the horse duty, which nobody asked to have abolished, and in taking off a penny from the income tax. He (Sir George Jenkinson) thought the right hon. Gentleman made a great mistake in doing as he had on that occasion. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Greenwich would have abolished the income tax altogether, but that was a thing to which he had always objected. He had always felt that if the income tax were abolished the Government would be deprived of the power of doing anything for the effective relief of local taxpayers by depriving themselves of the only possible mode of getting at the income of personal wealth to contribute. They should not be left to such spasmodic relief as could be afforded by chance surpluses from year to year. If their grievance was real, as the Government admitted it to be, they were entitled to some systematic measures of relief by effective legislation. It would not do to say with one breath that the grievance complained of was real, and then with another to say that no relief should be given unless there was a surplus from the Budget. He hoped now that the Budget was passed, and that no relief from it could be given to the reduction of local taxation, that the Government would take the matter into their serious consideration, and devise some effectual means for reducing the unjust incidence of that taxation in a bond fide manner next Session, otherwise he believed they would estrange earnest supporters who had placed them where they now were.

MR. SCLATER - BOOTH said, the proverb ran that "any stick would do to beat a dog with," and perhaps it was thought that any measure would do to hang a Vote of Censure upon. He thought, however, that the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had been unfortunate in selecting the topic which he had introduced for the purpose of attacking the measure now under discussion, which had little or nothing to do with the question of local taxation. The object of the two Bills which had been introduced by the Government was to take away from the Treasury the control in respect of reducing the interest on loans, and of extending the time of repayment. The subject was not one on which the policy of the Government could be fairly challenged with regard to local finance or local administration, and his right hon. Friend, in introducing those measures, never regarded them in that light. With regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for Hackney, he would venture to say that he himself had always been mindful of economy of the public expenditure, and had endeavoured to shield the Exchequer from unwarrantable attacks; and perhaps, therefore, his opinion was en-

ject into two branches, and wished to reverse the order of procedure of the late Government. What was complained of now was, not the order of procedure, but the pace, which was not fast enough for the exigencies of the time. The right hon. Gentleman talked of the necessity of proceeding step by step; but in the Committee, presided over by the right hon. Member for the City of London, the hon. Baronet, now Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Sir Massey Lopes), proposed a Resolution against proceeding step by step, and declaring that the Government of the day ought to bring in a comprehensive measure. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the improvement of administration; but all he had to say was, that the Government would be ready to consider the question at the proper time. Had he not shown that the Government had shrunk step by step from the promises they had made and the expectations they had held out, and was it not reasonable, under the circumstances, to urge them to display a little more courage and energy? Scarcely enough had been said about the measure to which the hon. Member for Hackney referred. He (Mr. Stansfeld) understood from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the object was to bring the matter forward, so as to induce Parliament to take effective steps, and he concluded from what had been said that it was designed to place some check on the growth of local indebtedness, and to make it less easy for the Government to compound or to remit these debts. But this purpose was no realization of what they had been led to expect from the language used by the Prime Minister. Assuming even that that policy could be effectively carried out, he put it to the House whether the Bill could be reasonably regarded as "laying the foundation of measures for dealing effectively with the whole question of local government and local taxation." Every year an estimate was to be made and presented to Parliament of the probable amount of money which would be advanced to local bodies. To allow of that being done, every local body, previous to the 31st of December, was to send in an estimate of the amount of money it would require in the course of the ensuing financial year. How was that estimate to be framed? He confessed that his anticipations were of an unfavourable character, and he held that these estimates would be entirely unreliable on account of the manner in which they were to be made. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in proposing his estimate, would not have such particulars as would enable him to be accurate; and he would necessarily be led to ask for an outside and unnecessary amount. There was a still more serious aspect of the case, and that was that the responsibility of the Treasury in reference to these money matters would be diminished, whilst extra responsibility would be thrown upon the House. The consequence of this, he ventured to predict, would be that whereas at present applications for loans of public money were discussed and considered by a Department specially qualified for the duty, those questions in future would tend to be governed by political considerations, and to be decided on the floor of the House or negotiated in the Lobbies. A time might even come when, at some critical moment in the fortunes of a Government, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would make a concession to the Representatives of particular localities either by way of advancing a loan or by foregoing interest, or, it might be, by remitting the loan altogether. But there were several supplementary measures which might be supposed to fulfil the hopes held out by the Government. Those measures were the Artizans Dwellings Bill, the Public Health Bill, and the Pollution of Rivers Bill. The first of these measures was one to which he willingly assented; but after all, instead of affecting local government, it simply provided a mode of procedure to be followed in certain cases and was in its principle permissive; the second was a creditable proposal, but was merely a measure of consolidation, and the third was a Bill the impracticability of the proposals of which simply proved the necessity of at once taking a complete and comprehensive view of the whole question, instead of attempting piecemeal to deal with a question of the first importance. He believed that upon this question excessive expectations which could not be fulfilled had been held out, but still something could be done. He believed that they were all agreed that there should be some contribution from Imperial sources to local rates, because much of local contributions were expended for national purposes. The other branch of the subject was paration of such a measure should be conceded to him. Within the last few weeks he had stated that a Valuation Bill might have been introduced, and would have been introduced, but for the impossibility of carrying it this Session. He would also have been glad to have introduced a Highways Bill, had it not been for the same cause. He, however, had at the present time a small measure prepared, which he hoped to be able to introduce and to pass this Session, which would facilitate the introduction of further measures of local administrative reform, and under which power would be given to the Local Government Board to carry into effect the recommendations of the Select Committee upon Boundaries which sat two years ago. That measure would be ready for introduction in a very few days, and he trusted that if passed it would get rid of some of the anomalies which at present defaced the union map of England. He agreed with the hon. Member for Hackney that the metropolis had in some respects gone far beyond the country in matters of local administration; and if the example it had set, for instance, in the matter of out-door relief, were followed by the country at large, much benefit would result from the change. One would really suppose, from the course taken by some hon. Gentlemen on the Government side of the House, that there was nothing the county Members had so much at heart as the establishment of county financial boards; but he believed that a great deal of the anxiety now felt on that subject, and on what was called administrative reform, arose from the irritation prevailing in consequence of the abolition of turnpike tolls, and the unsatisfactory mode in which the highway rates were administered. When, however, he suggested any practical solution of the question he always found that the widest differences of opinion on the subject prevailed. It was, therefore, difficult to imagine what section of the Members of the House was likely to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney. Certainly the Scotch Members would not do it, for none had been more pleased than they with the Government subventions of last year. The right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) would surely not do it, for when the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Sir George Jenkinson) brought forward a Motion on the subject of highways, he admitted the force of the plea that there were subjects which had a prior claim on the attention of the Government, and that time ought to be allowed. No one would be happier than himself if they could make quicker advances in administrative reform. But any comprehensive measure dealing with the whole of the questions raised in the discussion was out of the question. No Government would propose such a scheme, and no Government could certainly carry it. There were, however, a number of proposals in contemplation, which collectively would amount to a great deal, while singly they were such as it was practicable to carry, and he hoped that some of them would be dealt with before much time had elapsed. Indeed, they were dealing with them already. He believed that the facilities which would hereafter be afforded to local authorities in regard to the borrowing of money would be of great advantage to the ratepayers, and that much light would be thrown by this means on the financial aspects of the question. At the same time, he hoped the House would not run away with the idea that the local authorities of the Kingdom, taken as a whole, were so heavily burdened as many hon. Gentlemen seemed to suppose. So far as he was able to form an opinion, he believed they might be indebted at that moment to the extent of three years' income. But the country at large was indebted to the extent of 10 years' income at least. He did not dispute that many local authorities were overburdened, and that some of them were badly administered. But, taken as a whole, he thought their financial condition afforded no reason for alarm. He did not expect that the Irish Members would support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney, nor did he think that the right hon. Gentleman on the front Opposition bench could consistently vote for it. No Administration would venture to lay a tax upon the people with a view of relieving local rates; and therefore it was incumbent upon the Government to make the proposal they did last year, and then was the time to object to the course which was pursued. But, while saying that, it must not be supposed for a moment that he or, so far as he knew, any hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench was indifferent to the necessity of regulating local titled to some little indulgence when he said that the subventions in aid of local rates made by the Government last year were defensible in principle, and, as far as they went, ought to be satisfactory to the country. So long ago as 1868, being then Financial Secretary to the Treasury, in reply to the hon. Member for South Devon (Sir Massey Lopes), he pointed to the cost of lunatics and police as being an item of expenditure to which the hon. Member might with advantage address himself in future, and the subventions in aid of these local services now made were not, in his opinion, open to objection. The expenditure upon the police was one which might properly be assisted by the Treasury, not only because the police service was of an Imperial character, but because the tendency of the localities was to administer it economically; the fact being, he believed, that the Government Inspectors, as a rule, stimulated the cost of the police. The hon. Gentleman the Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) had dwelt on the wasteful character of various small police jurisdictions, and complained that the Government did not put an end to some of them. But the hon. Gentleman underrated the influence of the Members for the small boroughs, by whom these police forces were cherished, and whose opposition would make it very difficult to abolish these jurisdictions. Nobody, however, could dispute the propriety of the advice given by the hon. Member as to the unnecessary expense entailed by all these separate jurisdictions, and he hoped the country would take this advice to heart. The subvention for lunatics had been of important advantage to the payers of poor rates throughout the country, and it was an advantage which they enjoyed without the slightest risk of being tempted to extravagant outlay. On the contrary, the lunatics were removed from the power of the guardians as soon as they were transferred; the guardians no longer had the control of their expenditure; and the subvention was not only an advantage to the ratepayer, but was in itself a safe and wise measure. Besides, the Government had secured an audit of the expenditure upon lunatics—an important safeguard—the whole of the money expended for their maintenance having been checked and audited by the Government auditors. Then, last year, it must be remembered, in return for the gift of these subventions, the Government had induced their supporters to make some sacrifices by assenting to the Rating Act. He had never denied that the greater part of this measure had been introduced in the previous year by the late Government, but they were unable to carry it. The Bill contained much that was distasteful to supporters of the present Ministry; but they felt the necessity of inducing the House to assent to the abolition of certain exemptions, which accordingly ceased to exist. Now, the rating of game was not likely to be very productive. Not so, however, the rating of mines, which, in some counties, were of great importance. In one union, he was told that more than £100,000 a-year had been already added to the rateable value of the property within it, and in another case, within three months £30,000 a-year had been added in the same way. In adopting the system of subventions, he contended that the Government were not initiating a new policy, inasmuch as that system was first established by Sir Robert Peel in 1846, and had been followed by the late Government in their Public Health Bill, in which they proposed that the State should pay one half of the salaries of the medical officers and of the Inspectors of nuisances. As a proof that the adoption of a system of subventions did not necessarily lead to extravagance on the part of the local authorities, he might refer to the fact that although the original estimate for the salaries of those officers under that Bill had been £100,000 a-year, yet there had been a reduction in that estimate, year by year, until the estimate for the present year only amounted to £65,000. He freely admitted that the measure dealt with only a part of a great subject; but hon. Members must remember that when the right hon. Gentleman opposite brought forward his Rating Act and other measures as part of a great subject, he had frightened the House by laying upon the Table legislative proposals that would have fully occupied its attention for three Sessions, and by intimating that he had further work for it in the same direction in reserve. Taking into account the spirit of resistance that was certain to be developed in that House by any measure for constituting a county authority, he thought that he might fairly ask that ample time for the preparation of such a measure should be conceded to him. Within the last few weeks he had stated that a Valuation Bill might have been introduced, and would have been introduced, but for the impossibility of carrying it this Session. He would also have been glad to have introduced a Highways Bill, had it not been for the same cause. He, however, had at the present time a small measure prepared, which he hoped to be able to introduce and to pass this Session, which would facilitate the introduction of further measures of local administrative reform, and under which power would be given to the Local Government Board to carry into effect the recommendations of the Select Committee upon Boundaries which sat two years ago. No Administration would venture to lay a tax upon the people with a view of relieving local rates; and therefore it was incumbent upon the Government to make the proposal they did last year, and then was the time to object to the course which was pursued. But, while saying that, it must not be supposed for a moment that he or, so far as he knew, any hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench was indifferent to the necessity of regulating local finance and diminishing local burdens—of spreading these burdens wherever they could be spread, of providing a greater unity of administration, and of concentrating the local authorities under a higher and better authority which would stand between them and the Government. There was too much disposition at present to rely upon the Government and the Government Inspectors; and he had heard during the debate the most contradictory opinions upon this subject. At one moment he had heard the opinion that the central authority did too much, and at the next moment that it had no power at all. In that free country, accustomed to self-government, it was a most difficult problem to reconcile a reasonable, satisfactory, and sufficient interference on the part of the central authority with that local independence to which Englishmen were accustomed, and which they all desired to maintain. Moreover, it must be borne in mind, as he had already pointed out, that even if the mind of the Government were clear as to what measures were necessary and justifiable, they had still to consider what they could propose with a fair chance of success, or how far they should go. Moreover, the power of resistance in that House to measures of detail was enormous, and the means of causing delay in the progress of measures seemed to be every year increasing, and he was sure that would be an element of consideration in the matter which would not be overlooked by his right hon. Friend opposite. In conclusion, he thanked his hon. Friends on the same side of the House as himself for the great readiness with which they had entered upon these questions, notwithstanding their delicate and difficult character; and he expressed a hope that when other measures of gradual reform were introduced they would manfully support the Government in their endeavours to carry them to a successful issue.

MR. STANSFELD said, that most of the speeches in that debate, although they had come from the other side of the House, had been really in favour of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett). He did not, however, refer to those speeches as indications of the votes that would be recorded, because, for instance, the hon. Member for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell), who had spoken entirely in favour of the Amendment, and whose object was to give a few words of caution to the Government, intimated that he could not vote with the hon. Member for Hackney because of his antecedents; while the hon. Member for West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck), having nothing to say against the Amendment, could only justify himself for not following the hon. Member for Hackney into the Lobby, on the ground that it was a Vote of Confidence or No Confidence, and in a choice of evils he would choose the least. The course of the debate was due in a great degree to the astute policy and tactics of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who originated the debate in a way which caused some surprise. It was not very easy to ascertain from the conversational remarks with which he had done so what was the right hon. Gentleman's object. As far as he (Mr. Stansfeld) could guess his object, it was this—first of all the right hon. Gentleman, addressing himself almost exclusively to his own side of the House, gave promises of more Imperial subventions yet to come; he told his supporters that the question of the cost of the administration of justice had not yet been considered; that it was a complex question, but the Government were determined at the earliest possible date to consider it; and doubtless the conclusion to which they came would have effect given to it on the next occasion when they had a favourable Budget. Another object of the right hon. Gentleman appeared to be by anticipation to take away the character of that debate on a very serious subject, on which the country and his own Party were very seriously interested and not entirely satisfied, by calling it a Social Science discussion. Now, the right hon. Gentleman had not that evening appeared so conscious, as he had been on former occasions, either of the importance of the question, or of the magnitude and definitiveness of the promises the Government had made, and the expectations they had raised. The hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. Fawcett) had referred to the debate on the Address, and also to the remarks of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in bringing in the Bill on which the present Amendment was moved; but they were not merely discussing whether they had a right to expect that more would have been done by the Government that Session, but whether the Government had not held out definite expectations to its own Party and to the country which it had now put it out of its own power to fulfil. A deputation from the Local Taxation Committee of the Central and Associated Chambers of Agriculture about a year ago waited on the Prime Minister and urged him to undertake the whole question of local taxation reform. And what was the Prime Minister's reply? First of all, he took exclusive possession for himself and his Party of the question of local taxation reform, because he had had it in hand for more than 25 years; and he reminded the deputation that when he first took the lead of the Conservative Party he brought that question before the House, adding that almost every Member of the present Government had advocated the same views during a long period of years, and it was not at all probable that, being now in power by no ambiguous or equivocal expression of the public will, the Government would take the earliest opportunity of being false to the cause they had so long upheld. After that assertion, he (Mr. Stansfeld) had the curiosity to consult Hansard, to ascertain what were the views expressed a quarter of a century ago by the right hon. Gentleman, and he found that his Resolution was to this effect—

"That the whole of the local taxation of the country for national purposes, falls mainly, if not exclusively, on real property, and bears with undue severity on the occupiers of land, in a manner injurious to the agricultural interests of the country, and otherwise highly impolitic and unjust."—[3 Hansard, ciii. 453.]

In his speech when moving that Resolution, the right hon. Gentleman referred to certain local taxes and local burdens, and spoke of an amount of £10,000,000 per annum as being the sum in 1848, made up by the poor rate with its collateral minor rates, the county rate, the highway rate, and church rate; and he added to those rates £2,000,000 more in respect to land tax and some other charges, and the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman at that time were that one-half of such amount should be borne by rates, but that the other half should be borne by the general taxation of the country. Whether the expectations and proposals which were so indulged in were reasonable or not, at any rate they were definite, and one could not marvel that when such promises had been held out there was some disappointment at the course pursued by the Government in the present Session. In his Budget speech of last year, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said the Government put the question of local taxation first because it was the highest object of national interest at that time, and he said Parliament ought to consider the position it really occupied, not only in our financial, but also in our social and political system. Therefore, in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman this was the most important question of the day. The right hon. Gentleman made his views still more clear by going into details and dividing the question into three—namely, Imperial services charged exclusively or in undue proportion on local resources, areas of rating and exemptions of certain classes of property unfair, and extravagance resulting from an improper division of the country into local districts. In conclusion, the right hon. Gentleman said the matter would continue to engage the attention of the Government, not only with reference to the question of burdens, but also with reference to the improvement of administration, the possible necessity of altering the present system, and the devotion of some branch of the general revenue to local purposes. But the speech of the right hon. Gentleman this year exhibited a falling-off in his estimate of the magnitude of the question, of its urgency, and of the obligation of the Government to deal with it. That falling-off was the cause of the doubt and anxiety which many of them felt. In bringing in the Public Works Loans Bill the right hon. Gentleman said the Government were taunted in some quarters with not bringing in a large measure of re-construction, and added—

"I would say that I am not aware that any Member of Her Majesty's Government has at any time ever expressed any intention of proposing any such measure, or has expressed himself in favour of dealing with the question upon these principles," and concluding with the remark—

"We are as conscious as anybody can be conscious of the need of reforms . . . and we do not abandon the hope that we may be able to introduce such reforms."—[3 Hansard, cxxii. 218-19.]

When a strong Government which came into office upon its views of this subject as being the most important subject of the day began to talk of not abandoning the hope of doing something, surely others were justified in expressing some apprehension and alarm. Even to-night the right hon. Gentleman who had spoken for the Ministry gave them cause for fear rather than hope. He divided the subject into two branches, and wished to reverse the order of procedure of the late Government. What was complained of now was, not the order of procedure, but the pace, which was not fast enough for the exigencies of the time. The right hon. Gentleman talked of the necessity of proceeding step by step; but in the Committee, presided over by the right hon. Member for the City of London, the hon. Baronet, now Civil Lord of the Admiralty (Sir Massey Lopes), proposed a Resolution against proceeding step by step, and declaring that the Government of the day ought to bring in a comprehensive measure. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the improvement of administration; but all he had to say was, that the Government would be ready to consider the question at the proper time. Had he not shown that the Government had shrunk step by step from the promises they had made and the expectations they had held out, and was it not reasonable, under the circumstances, to urge them to display a little more courage and energy? Scarcely enough had been said about the measure to which the hon. Member for Hackney referred. He (Mr. Stansfeld) understood from the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the object was to bring the matter forward, so as to induce Parliament to take effective steps, and he concluded from what had been said that it was designed to place some check on the growth of local indebtedness, and to make it less easy for the Government to compound or to remit these debts. But this purpose was no realization of what they had been led to expect from the language used by the Prime Minister. Assuming even that that policy could be effectively carried out, he put it to the House whether the Bill could be reasonably regarded as "laying the foundation of measures for dealing effectively with the whole question of local government and local taxation." Every year an estimate was to be made and presented to Parliament of the probable amount of money which would be advanced to local bodies. To allow of that being done, every local body, previous to the 31st of December, was to send in an estimate of the amount of money it would require in the course of the ensuing financial year. How was that estimate to be framed? He confessed that his anticipations were of an unfavourable character, and he held that these estimates would be entirely unreliable on account of the manner in which they were to be made. The Chancellor of the Exchequer, in proposing his estimate, would not have such particulars as would enable him to be accurate; and he would necessarily be led to ask for an outside and unnecessary amount. There was a still more serious aspect of the case, and that was that the responsibility of the Treasury in reference to these money matters would be diminished, whilst extra responsibility would be thrown upon the House. The consequence of this, he ventured to predict, would be that whereas at present applications for loans of public money were discussed and considered by a Department specially qualified for the duty, those questions in future would tend to be governed by political considerations, and to be decided on the floor of the House or negotiated in the Lobbies. A time might even come when, at some critical moment in the fortunes of a Government, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would make a concession to the Representatives of particular localities either by way of advancing a loan or by foregoing interest, or, it might be, by remitting the loan altogether. But there were several supplementary measures which might be supposed to fulfil the hopes held out by the Government. Those measures were the Artizans Dwellings Bill, the Public Health Bill, and the Pollution of Rivers Bill. The first of these measures was one to which he willingly assented; but after all, instead of affecting local government, it simply provided a mode of procedure to be followed in certain cases and was in its principle permissive; the second was a creditable proposal, but was merely a measure of consolidation, and the third was a Bill the impracticability of the proposals of which simply proved the necessity of at once taking a complete and comprehensive view of the whole question, instead of attempting piecemeal to deal with a question of the first importance. He believed that upon this question excessive expectations which could not be fulfilled had been held out, but still something could be done. He believed that they were all agreed that there should be some contribution from Imperial sources to local rates, because much of local contributions were expended for national purposes. The other branch of the subject was much more complicated and of greater importance, and that was the reforming and completing the system of local administration. As illustrating his view of the importance and emergency of this question, he might mention the highways and the pollution of rivers as matters calling for immediate attention. With regard to the first, his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board early in the Session stated, in reply to the hon. Baronet the Member for North Wilts (Sir George Jenkinson), that the matter could not be dealt with at present because the question of local government stood in the way. His right hon. Friend at the head of the Local Government Board used these words—

“The question of local government was inextricably mixed up with highway management, especially within the last three or four years, and they could not deal with one without considering, to a great extent, what should be the future arrangements as to the other.”—[3 Hansard, cccxii. 957.]

Therefore they had from the most responsible Member of Her Majesty's Government with respect to this subject the declaration that the important and urgent question of highways could not be dealt with till they were ready to take up on a large scale the consideration of the question of local government. The case of rivers was even stronger than that of highways. They traversed many of the local sanitary districts into which the country was divided, and they required large areas for their management; but, in the absence of the large areas, to what conclusion had the Government been driven? The nature of their proposal was this—There were 1,400 urban and rural sanitary authorities in the country, and Government proposed to confer on them the right, and impose on them the obligation, of preventing the pollution of streams that flowed through their areas—preventing the pollution of streams not only within those areas, but anywhere above those areas. Her Majesty's Government were driven to the conclusion to impose this obligation on every sanitary authority throughout the country, and call on each of them to watch and, if need be, to go to law with towns and manufacturers polluting the streams above their areas—[“Order, order!”]

a Bill that is before the other House of Parliament.

MR. STANSFELD said, he had not the slightest wish to pursue any course that was out of Order, but he was under the impression that he was entitled to assume, from the sources of information open to all, that Her Majesty's Government intended to bring into that House a measure of that kind. But he wished to be entirely within the Rules of the House. The Government, however, had no alternative. They would be under the urgent necessity of dealing with the question of local government promptly and on a large scale. Manufacturers would consent to a stringent law on one condition only—namely, that it should be administered with something like uniformity, as between competitors in the same trade residing in different parts of the country; and this could only be effected by extending the administration over large local areas. Together with a growing spirit of centralization, which could not be directly opposed, inasmuch as it existed in the nature of things, there was a falling off of the spirit of vitality of local government in this country. The only way to revivify that spirit of local government was to enlarge its area and to elevate its functions by creating bodies which the Imperial Government would feel bound to respect. The establishment of municipalities in counties, the creation of county, financial, and administrative boards, constituted in his mind the key of the position; and he entreated Her Majesty's Government to address itself to that question at the earliest possible period.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, if it was true, as he assumed it to be, that the condition of local government in this country might be properly described by the word “chaotic,” he might remark that this evening's discussion had been a very fair reflex of its subject-matter. They had had hon. Gentlemen reminding them of pledges of which they neither told them where they were made, nor by whom they were made, nor the terms in which they were made, and they had had hon. Gentlemen ignoring what they had done, and misrepresenting what they were doing and what they were going to do. They had sometimes found themselves discussing a new kind of local government of a most highly centralized description, something like the French

Member for Hackney for the speech he had made and the discussion he had raised. That speech would be no insignificant contribution to the future elucidation of the subject, which was one of the most difficult and complicated the House could be called upon to consider, and which was not thoroughly understood either in the House or in the country. Not only had the hon. Member for Hackney added to the comprehension of the subject, but whatever might be the result of the division, he had also obtained no small share of support from both sides of the House. Hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House had plainly said that they agreed with the Motion of the hon. Member and with his speech, but they would not be able to support him in the Lobby—one because he regarded the Motion as a Motion of Want of Confidence in the Government, and another because of the views he held as to the quarter from which the Motion proceeded. At present the Liberal Party was young in Opposition and the arts of Opposition; but the support they had received on this question was hopeful. He would venture to express a hope that, warned by those utterances, in another Session a Resolution would be prepared which would not be an expression of Want of Confidence in the present Government, but would be such as would enable the hon. Members for South Leicestershire (Mr. Pell) and West Norfolk (Mr. Bentinck) to vote as they desired for the Resolution without disturbing the present Government. His hon. Friend the Member for Hackney had obtained more than approval from the other side of the House—he had drawn from the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as the Representative of the Government, a declaration of their policy on this subject. The House had been told to-night what they were not told either on the Budget or on Friday last. When the subject of the administration of justice was before the House, they were told that it was the intention of the Government, as soon as they found themselves in possession of funds, to make a further subvention in aid of the administration of justice, and practically they had to-night been told by the Government that their policy in respect to this question was nothing more than a continuation of the policy of subventions. Did the House suppose it was likely that when the discontent of ratepayers had been somewhat appeased for a time by subventions granted from the public Exchequer, and the Government were pressed by business on all sides, they would think the time had come to deal with that most difficult of questions the reform of our local administrations? It would be difficult to find a House of Commons, representing to a very large extent constituencies of ratepayers, who would turn a deaf ear when the Government of the day proposed increased subventions in aid of rates; but he thought it was right that it should be known so long beforehand that the policy of the Government was a policy of subventions, and nothing else, in order that the country might fully consider and weigh well what the meaning of such a policy was. He should like to ask what ultimate benefit the ratepayers themselves would obtain from such a policy? The right hon. Gentleman, in his Statement on the Budget, gave the House some figures as to the progress of local taxation during the last three years. He (the Marquess of Hartington) would not weary the House by going over those figures, but he believed he was stating accurately the figures which were given by the right hon. Gentleman when he said that in the last three years the increase of rates had been over £1,100,000, which was somewhat in excess of the amount of the subvention which had been given by the right hon. Gentleman. Then what he wished to point out was, that if at the time when the Motion of the hon. Baronet the Member for South Devon was carried, the ratepayers were groaning under an intolerable load of taxation, in spite of the subvention of the right hon. Gentleman, they had much better reason to groan now. He did not mean to say that the burden would not be greater if these subventions had not been given; but the progress of local taxation was such, that we could not cope with it by means of subventions, unless new objects were continually to be found to which subventions would be given. He believed that relief to the ratepayer was not to be found in this policy of subventions, but in the reform of local institutions, and that the ratepayers of the country had more to expect from efficient and economical administration than from Government grants. They had been told by the right hon. Gentleman that one of the objects to follow from the passing of this Bill was, that it would enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the President of the Local Government Board annually to lay before this House a statement in the nature of a Budget of local expenditure. That was a thing which was greatly desired by some hon. Members, and among them by his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool (Mr. Rathbone.) It might have its advantages, but he failed to see that in such a statement the local ratepayers would find any great consolation. What was the use of Parliament listening to a Local Taxation Budget of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, if it was to do nothing but look on at a continually increasing expenditure and indebtedness! What was required was not a Local Taxation Budget presented to that House, but one presented to the ratepayers of every locality. What we wanted was a Local Taxation Budget presented to every county, to every municipal borough, to every town, and to every area of local taxation and government, so that every ratepayer might know, what not one in every thousand knew at present, what he was to be called upon to pay, by whom it was to be levied, and to what objects it was to be applied. Such a reform as that they would not be able to accomplish until they had obtained a simplification of the areas of local government, something in the nature of a consolidated rate, identity of valuation, and strengthened and remodelled local government bodies. Until they had effected some such reforms, they might increase the subsidies, they might year by year make it as easy as they liked for local bodies to borrow at low rates of interest; but their subsidies would be all swallowed up in the bottomless pit of weak and inefficient administration, and, whilst they imagined they were relieving the local ratepayers, they would only succeed in being false to their trust as guardians of the public purse, by adding to the burdens of the people. Believing that the proposals of the Government had fallen short of the pledges which they themselves had given in former Sessions, he could not if his hon. Friend were to go to a division do otherwise than give him his cordial support.
